[1] Less than ½ million dollars.

Business loans and guaranties: In the past year, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has contributed substantially to the financial stability of independent businesses, especially small business. The change in economic conditions last spring resulted in many financing needs which private lenders failed to meet, and consequently applications for Reconstruction Finance Corporation business loans increased rapidly. During recent months, the Corporation has been making about 450 new loans per month, or nearly twice the rate of a year ago. With the favorable business outlook now anticipated, a somewhat lower level of new loan authorizations is estimated in 1951, but net expenditures are expected to rise above 1950 because of disbursements on loans authorized this year. In future years, repayments will provide increasing offsets to disbursements on new loans.

To make sure that this program will meet the needs of business for long-term credit, I am renewing the recommendation for a substantial increase in the present 10-year maximum on loan maturities. I also recommend an addition to the funds available for business loans.

Promotion and regulation of business: Since the war we have substantially strengthened our antimonopoly program, but continued improvement is essential. I have asked the Secretary of Commerce, in consultation with the Attorney General, the Federal Trade Commission, and the Council of Economic Advisers, to develop recommendations for increasing the effectiveness of this program. A major aspect of this study will be the development of methods to facilitate establishment of small businesses, to promote their stability and growth, and to remove obstacles to their survival as independent competitive enterprises.

The budget also provides additional funds for strengthening the antimonopoly activities of the Federal Trade Commission. Among other things, this will permit a study of trends in industrial concentration to guide the formulation of Federal policy and to aid in prosecuting specific cases.

As the record levels of housing construction have gradually reduced the housing shortage, rent controls have been removed in many communities. This trend probably will continue. To prevent serious hardship to tenants in areas where shortages remain critical, I am recommending a 1-year extension of rent control authority beyond the present expiration date of June 30, 1950.

Improvement in the supply situation has permitted removal of most commodities from export control. Export licensing of some strategic commodities, however, remains essential because of the uncertain international situation.

Labor

The programs of the Federal Government in the field of labor are designed to encourage increasingly effective use of our major productive resource—the skill of the American workingman—with the ultimate objective of assuring higher production and standards of living. To this end, the Government fosters responsible and peaceful labor relations based on collective bargaining by offering voluntary mediation services and providing a remedy for unfair labor practices. It promotes fair labor standards for wages, hours, and employment conditions to prevent exploitation and unfair competition based on substandard conditions. It finances a free placement service to aid industry, agriculture, and workers and insures workers, mainly through a Federal-State system, against total loss of income during periods of temporary unemployment. Finally, it collects and publishes information on wages, employment, prices, construction, and other subjects in order that business and economic planning and decisions may be on a factual basis.

The importance of these programs is by no means measured by the total expenditures of 243 million dollars in 1951, since many of the activities are regulatory in nature and require only minor expenditures. Of total expenditures, about 70 percent consists of grants to States for administration of the Federal-State employment service and unemployment compensation system.

Placement and unemployment compensation activities: The Federal Government sets standards and pays all administrative costs for State operation of public employment offices and unemployment insurance. Public employment offices placed applicants in more than 12,000,000 jobs during the past fiscal year. Of the total job placements, over 7,000,000 were on farms. Still more placements are expected in 1950 and 1951.

The unemployment compensation work load is closely related to general economic conditions. Last year the Congress recognized this fact by appropriating a contingency fund of 5 percent of the basic grants, to be used if the number of claims increased. It now appears that this contingency fund will not be sufficient to pay for the increase in work load which has occurred. I shall, therefore, request a supplemental appropriation for 1950. For 1951, the budget recommendations for the basic grants assume a somewhat lower average level of unemployment but call for a contingency fund of 10 percent to obviate delays in paying valid claims, should the volume of claims suddenly rise.

Mediation and regulation of labor relations: In my State of the Union Message I have discussed the imperative need for basic revision of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 to incorporate sound provisions on the rights and responsibilities of labor and management in relation to each other and to the general public, and to remove unworkable administrative provisions in the present law. This budget allows for improving mediation and conciliation activities by providing funds to permit relatively equal service for all parts of the country and for the recently expanded organization for adjustment of employee grievances in the railway industry.

Labor standards and labor training: The 1949 amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act, while inadequate in many respects, made substantial improvements in the law by raising the minimum wage to 75 cents an hour and tightening the provision against the use of child labor in production for interstate commerce. I am recommending increased funds for the additional inspection and legal staff which effective enforcement will require. Such enforcement is essential, not only to protect the purchasing power of workers who need it most, but also to protect law-abiding employers from unfair competition.

Two legislative proposals respecting employment conditions, and one on training, should be enacted promptly. First, a permanent Fair Employment Practice Commission should be established. To keep minority groups economically submerged is not only unjust and discriminatory, but also prevents the best use of available manpower. Secondly, I am renewing my recommendation for grants to States to assist them to encourage industrial safety. The Federal Government and the States spend many millions of dollars each year to rehabilitate injured workers. It is only common sense to do what we can to prevent injuries in the first place. Finally, I recommend that a labor extension service be established in the Department of Labor to make available to wage earners educational programs designed to promote sound labor-management relations. Such a program would require about 3 million dollars a year after it gets into operation but would not have substantial effect on the 1951 budget because of the time required to get under way at the local level.

Trust accounts and unemployment compensation legislation: Last year's temporary but sharp rise in unemployment provided the first real test of the Federal-State unemployment insurance system since its establishment 15 years ago. The system was of great help in tiding workers over temporary unemployment and in sustaining markets for the products of employed workers. During the last 12 months, a total of 1.7 billion dollars in benefits was paid from the trust fund. At the same time, major shortcomings of the present system became painfully clear. It does not cover enough workers, and does not replace enough of the wages lost through unemployment. I shall submit proposals for legislation to overcome these and other defects by strengthening the present Federal-State system.

At present, only about two-thirds of the workers employed in nonagricultural industries are insured against the hazards of temporary unemployment. Coverage should be extended to employees of small establishments, of industries processing agricultural products, and of the Federal Government. This would raise coverage to about three-fourths of nonagricultural workers. Furthermore, legislation should include minimum Federal standards for eligibility and disqualifications, in order to remove some of the present inequalities in administration among the States.

Present weekly benefits now average about one-third of previously earned weekly wages. The insurance was originally intended to replace at least half of previous earnings—the minimum needed to pay for food and rent—but benefits in many States have not kept up with price rises. In order to assure more nearly adequate benefits throughout the Nation, the Federal law should provide minimum standards for benefits paid from the State trust accounts. These standards should require benefits of 50 percent of previous wages up to 30 dollars a week for single workers, with additional amounts for dependents up to 42 dollars a week for a worker with three dependents. The legislation should also require that benefits be available to eligible claimants for at least 26 weeks.

In addition to these changes in coverage and benefit standards, I shall recommend amendments to the financing provisions of present legislation, including establishment of a reinsurance system to provide grants to States whose reserves for benefits become temporarily low, despite reasonable measures to maintain adequate funds. Although most States have sufficient reserves to pay higher benefits without increasing taxes, one or two States may need assistance by next autumn or shortly thereafter.

The proposed legislation will affect chiefly the trust fund rather than the appropriations for administration. For both the trust fund and the appropriations, the effect in the fiscal year 1951 will be slight because time will be required for the State legislatures to revise their laws to conform with new standards established by the Congress. Benefits for Federal workers will represent the principal continuing budgetary cost of my recommendations. (The estimated expenditures for these benefits in the fiscal year 1951 are shown under general government.) Estimates for proposed reinsurance appropriations are also included in the budget. Expenditures from these appropriations will be necessary only if State reserves become inadequate to provide for temporarily high numbers of insured unemployed.

General government

The expenditures for general government cover legislative, judicial, and financial management activities, and also many Government-wide administrative services and programs such as property and records management, public buildings construction and maintenance, and the operations of the Civil Service Commission. The total expenditures for these programs for the fiscal year 1951 are estimated at 1.3 billion dollars compared to 1.2 billion for the current fiscal year. The increase is primarily for strengthening further the system of tax collection, for the Government payment to the employees' retirement system, and for public building sites and plans.

Internal revenue operations: Efficient operation of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the Federal Government's primary tax collection agency, is essential to protect the Federal revenue and to assure fair treatment to taxpayers. Studies of the organizational structure and administrative procedures of this agency have been under way for some time and have already resulted in many improvements, including the mechanization of some operations. These have enabled the Bureau to strengthen and extend its audit and enforcement activities, thereby collecting additional taxes, not only directly, but also by stimulating a greater degree of voluntary compliance. Further improvements are in prospect. The 1951 appropriation provides for increased funds for these purposes.

Property management: Under mandate of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, the General Services Administration was established to consolidate a number of Government-wide activities concerned with the procurement, maintenance, and disposal of Federal property. This was in accord with a major recommendation of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government. The General Services Administration is currently undertaking to establish records storage centers and is emphasizing the expansion of inspection services and traffic management, determination of purchasing requirements, and controls to insure proper utilization of Government property.

[1] This budget also includes 41 million dollars of appropriations to liquidate prior year contract authorizations.

Civilian employees' retirement system: Federal employees covered by the civil service retirement and disability system are required by law to contribute 6 percent of their salaries toward future benefits; the Government contributes the remaining cost of benefits provided under the system. The expenditures of 333 million dollars estimated for 1951 represent the Government payment necessary to enable the fund to cover its currently accruing obligations.

Construction of public buildings: Of estimated expenditures of 53 million dollars in 1951 for construction of public buildings, more than half is for acquiring sites and drawing plans for future construction in accordance with the Public Buildings Act of 1949. Expenditures for actual construction will be limited to projects already under way.

Operation of the Weather Bureau: Modest increases are requested to meet the increased demand for the services of the Weather Bureau. These include the requirements for general weather service, aviation forecasts, and assisting in the protection of our forests from fire hazards. Increases in Atlantic weather patrol observations and in forecasting and briefing services to pilots on international flights are to meet commitments under the International Civil Aviation Organization.

Government of Guam, Samoa, and the trust territory of the Pacific islands: It is the announced aim of this Government to accord civil government to the inhabitants of its non-self-governing Pacific territories—Guam and American Samoa—which have been under American rule for half a century, and the trust territory of the Pacific islands which we administer under a United Nations trusteeship agreement. As a partial step in this direction I have transferred administrative responsibility for Guam to the Secretary of the Interior and have directed that arrangements be made for a similar transfer on July 1, 1951, with respect to American Samoa and the trust territory. This budget contains 2 million dollars for Guam as part of a 4-million-dollar appropriation recommended for administration of Territories and possessions for the fiscal year 1951. I urge that the Congress enact the proposed organic acts now before it, providing for the civil government of Guam and American Samoa, and similar legislation for the trust territory of the Pacific islands.

Development of the National Capital: I renew my request that the National Capital Park and Planning Commission be established on a stronger statutory basis. This would enable the Commission to fulfill more effectively its obligations to plan the orderly, coordinated development of the District of Columbia and nearby areas in Maryland and Virginia.

Government Services Corporation: Several organizations not within the normal governmental framework now provide, in Government buildings and on Government property, cafeteria and recreational services for Federal employees. I recommend that the Congress pass legislation now before it to create a self-supporting Government corporation to carry out these essentially governmental responsibilities.

Federal employees' unemployment compensation: The proposed broadening of the coverage of the unemployment compensation program, recommended elsewhere in this message, requires a Government payment to extend coverage to Federal employees. This budget includes 13.5 million dollars for an appropriation to cover benefit payments in the second half of fiscal year 1951, when it is anticipated the program will be in operation.

Civil rights program: This budget includes funds to expand civil rights enforcement activities of the Department of Justice under present laws. In addition to the amount provided for establishing a Fair Employment Practice Commission, there is included 800 thousand dollars as the amount needed under proposed legislation to establish a permanent Commission on Civil Rights, which would continuously review our practices and policies in this field, and to provide for an additional Assistant Attorney General to supervise a needed civil rights division in the Department of Justice.

Interest on the public debt

Interest on the public debt is a fixed obligation of the Government, determined by the amount of Federal securities outstanding and their interest rates. Payments are financed by permanent indefinite appropriations which do not require annual congressional action.

Interest on the public debt

[Fiscal years. In millions]

Agency	Expenditures			Appropriations for 1951 (permanent indefinite)
	1949 actual	1950 estimated	1951 estimated
Treasury Department	$5,352	$5,725	$5,625	$5,625

Interest payments of 5.6 billion dollars estimated for 1951 are lower than those in 1950, because a shift in reporting methods caused a nonrecurring addition of over 200 million dollars in 1950. Under the new method, effective in the fiscal year 1950, all interest payments are now reported as they become payable rather than when they are actually paid. As a result of the transition, the 1950 total includes interest for prior years that was payable but had not yet been presented for payment at the beginning of the fiscal year 1950. This change does not significantly affect the reporting of interest payments in 1951 and later years.

Apart from this nonrecurring item, total interest payments will continue to rise in the fiscal year 1951. Each year more of the savings bonds sold during the war reach the stage where interest accrues at higher rates. Moreover, continuing accumulations of Government trust funds will cause further increases in special issues to such funds of obligations bearing rates of interest higher than the average on the entire public debt. Finally, the budget deficit this year and next will add to the total volume of interest-bearing debt. Savings in refunding operations, however, will offset some of this increase in interest cost.

Interest payments on the Federal debt are widely distributed, and represent a particularly important source of income to certain institutions and groups. Almost 2 billion dollars of interest in the fiscal year 1951 is expected to go to individuals and unincorporated businesses. About 1 billion dollars will be paid to commercial banks and almost 1.5 billion to insurance companies, mutual savings banks, and other private investors. Another 1 billion dollars will go to Government retirement funds, social security funds, and various other Government trust funds to build up reserves out of which future benefits will be paid. Over 250 million dollars of interest in 1951 will be paid to the Federal Reserve banks; more than half of such payments will be returned to the Treasury and deposited into miscellaneous receipts. The remainder will be used to defray most of the operating expenses of the Federal Reserve System, to pay dividends to member banks, and to add to surplus.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION—A SUMMARY

The following table shows estimated expenditures, appropriations, and other authorizations included in the budget for programs under proposed legislation. The second table shows the effect of proposed legislation upon the Government trust funds.

Many of the programs listed under proposed legislation are actually continuations of programs already in existence but for which new authorizations are required to permit their continuance in 1951. These items are set forth separately in the first part of the table.

The budget also contains a general reserve for contingencies. It is designed as a minimum provision for activities not now definitely foreseen, but on which action may be required before the end of the fiscal year.

The budget for the fiscal year 1951 reflects the great strength and the extensive responsibilities of this country. It represents much more than a collection of facts and figures—it represents the program which I am recommending for our Government in the months ahead. It will influence the course of events for years beyond 1951, and the success with which we push ahead toward enduring peace, continuing economic growth, and a steady strengthening of our democratic society.

In preparing this budget, I have earnestly applied the fundamental principles which, in the present circumstances, should guide us in the conduct of our affairs. It is an honest budget, which meets the realities which face us. It provides for essential activities on a minimum basis and no more, despite the great pressures which exist on every side for larger expenditures on specific programs. It meets the obligation of our Government to nourish and support the economic and social health of our Nation. It not only provides for substantial progress in 1951 toward our goal of budgetary balance but also lays the basis for further improvement in subsequent years consistent with the welfare of the country.

We are still a young and growing Nation with a great reserve of human skills and productive resources. We have made and shall make more progress toward a less threatening world. Our strength is not being impaired by our present great responsibilities and the temporary deficits required to meet them. Given wise policies, which meet the broadest tests of national welfare, we can look forward to the future with confidence.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

JANUARY 3, 1950.

Mr. RANKIN (interrupting the reading of the message). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the message be dispensed with and that the entire message be printed in the RECORD at this point.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems we ought to know what is going on.

Mr. McCORMACK. I object, Mr. Speaker. I think we ought to continue with the reading of the message. This is a Presidential message, and I think we all ought to hear it.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 309 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the message of the President of the United States.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, we have just heard the Clerk read the draft of the Federal fiscal program for the ensuing fiscal year as prepared under the President's direction and approval by him for consideration by the Congress.

It calls for somewhat smaller appropriations and expenditures than those requested for the current fiscal year, a gratifying reduction, but one which contemplates a deficit of upward of $5,000,000,000.

The appropriations proposed, including $4,500,000,000 for liquidating contract authorizations, aggregate $37,600,000,000. That amount omits $7,400,000,000 tentatively estimated for later submission. The over-all total is $45,000,000,000, a reduction of $7,900,000,000 under the current year as now projected.

Expenditures are proposed in the total amount of $42,400,000,000, which would flow from both new and existing obligational availability. That amount contrasts with $43,300,000,000 now projected for the current fiscal year.

The budget message is phrased in sanguine vein. The President expresses confidence "that the fiscal recommendations provide a solid basis for moving toward budgetary balance within the next few years." The realization of that expectation involves many factors, including contingencies, which need to be weighed carefully. Their materialization is not altogether within our own hands. Much depends upon developments beyond our shores, where our political and financial economy is inextricably involved. Under the circumstances there is reason to believe that we should proceed with a measure of caution and keep our budgeting more nearly in line with the principle of pay as we go.

It must be conceded that demands and obligations are such, at present, by reason of international situations and involvements, that we are precluded from operating wholly within income without material disadvantage, but undoubtedly we should consider with care the incurrence of new obligations, however meritorious they may appear, until our Treasury situation has definitely improved. We may exempt, of course, self-liquidating projects and projects which unmistakably contribute to enhancement of the national income, the only character of new obligations involving an overdraft upon our resources which we can afford to approve.

A deficit of $5,100,000,000 in times of peace, and especially during a period in which prosperity so generally prevails, runs counter to the conception of the majority of our people as to what constitutes sound financial housekeeping. It is my considered judgment that it is our clear duty to avoid, or at least reduce drastically, any such overdraft, first, by making lesser amounts available for expenditures than those proposed, and, second, by removing any residue through the medium of raising Treasury income, if only temporarily.

In the short time the budget has been available we have been limited to a rather hurried examination of its contents. But on even a cursory reading it is evident that it is susceptible to judicious pruning. However, unless we resort to indiscriminate cutting, a course both impracticable and indefensible, it is hardly possible to hope to make up the difference between unaugmented projected income and such outgo as it may be necessary to sanction. Should that situation develop, as there is reason to believe it will, then a new tax measure is warranted.

As Speaker RAYBURN sagely remarked a few days ago, "A prudent man pays his debts when he has the money." Like the prudent man, the Nation should not only be paying its way but should be paying something on its debt. No other course is tenable. Until we are again launched upon such a course we must exercise the greatest care in giving approval to new undertakings which would entail further borrowing.

Here in brief is a picture of the 1951 budget:

The estimate of over-all receipts is $37,300,000,000.

The estimate of over-all expenditures is $42,400,000,000.

That amount includes expenditures that would flow from $7,400,000,000 tentatively estimated for later submission in the form of new appropriations and other authorizations. An itemization of such subsequent submission commences on page M84 of the budget. The list is rather long, too long to read from the floor. Similar items may be found in table VII, commencing on page A–18 of the budget. The latter table also indicates the expenditures that would be made during the fiscal year 1951 in consequence of such tentative submissions.

If the budget were approved as presented, including tentative later submissions, the projected deficit would be $5,100,000,000, contrasted with $5,500,000,000 which is estimated as the deficit for the current fiscal year. The projected deficit for the ensuing fiscal year is predicated on lack of any additional revenues which might accrue from the enactment of recommendations later to be presented for the purpose of effecting certain adjustments in our tax laws. Possibly it should be added, that the projected expenditure total and the projected total deficit presuppose action by the Congress augmenting postal receipts to the extent of $395,000,000.

The projected expenditure total comprises amounts—

From appropriations proposed in the budget	$26,725,000,000
From appropriations heretofore made	12,100,000,000
From unpredictable deficiency and supplemental appropriations (this applies to the reserve for contingencies)	175,000,000
From appropriations for objects in the "tentative later submission" category	3,400,000,000

These amounts add up to $42,400,000,000, the total projected expenditure figure previously given.

It is within these expenditure classifications we must find a way to curtail projected Treasury withdrawals. As formerly, the task is made difficult by the allocations for and in consequence of national defense, past and present, and the efforts in which we are engaged for the promotion of world-wide peace. Seventy percent of the spending program is directly traceable to such objects. However, that is not an untouchable field, and it may be that as we examine such allocations in the Appropriations Committee we may find warrant for substituting lesser amounts. You may be certain we shall not hesitate to use the knife when justified by sound business considerations.

In phases of the budget not associated with war and its aftermath, we shall studiously examine any new projects proposed; any increases over current provision for routine Federal operations will be carefully scrutinized; and every effort will be made to determine if such operations may not be satisfactorily financed with lesser amounts than are currently available. In other words, our aim will be to effect reductions wherever possible without impairing efficiency of administration and without contravention of the public interest.

That is not a new committee policy. It merely is a reiteration of the generally conceived duty and practice of the Appropriations Committee to strive to the utmost to conserve tax dollars. Never was that duty of greater importance than at this time, operating as we are in the red and confronted by a continuation of deficit spending in the next succeeding fiscal year.

And make no mistake about it, my friends, deficit spending is not popular with the folks back home. They are insisting in emphatic terms upon a curtailment of Federal spending.

The projected withdrawal figure incident to later submission is not wholly subject to control by the Committee on Appropriations, because a large portion of such submissions must wait authorizing legislation. Legislative authorization must first be secured and in that connection, attention should again be called to the imperative need of considering the financial impact on our fiscal economy of such authorizing legislation when current demands already are consuming all available Treasury income. How, under the sun, can we achieve and maintain a balanced budget if we continue to pyramid new demands upon expenditures already authorized unless we dispense with existing authorizations or provide additional revenue.

Personally, I welcome Minority Leader MARTIN's "price tag" committee suggestion, proposing to put a cost label on every spending bill. In that connection, may I suggest, however, that a more orderly procedure would be a rule requiring all reports on bills to include a statement of cost, and making reports failing to include such statement subject to a point of order.

As a matter of fact, the majority welcomes help from any source which will contribute to economical Federal budgeting. We have been striving since VJ-day to get our financial house in order. Hiroshima was but a few days past before we began recapturing appropriations and the cancellation of upward of $64,000,000,000 which were then open to obligation. Within 6 months after the close of the fiscal year in which fighting ceased President Truman transmitted to the Congress a balanced budget. Up to that time the President had brought about a reduction in the public debt, from its peak of $272,000,000,000 of more than $20,000,000,000.

The situation today is even more imperative.

From every technical and statistical point of view our fiscal situation is the most unfavorable in the peacetime hisory of the Republic. In the last session it was customary to refer to the national debt as a two hundred and fifty-two billion obligation. The final Treasury report, as of December 30, 1949, indicates a total debt of $257,160,110,000, or $4,405,708,000 more than on the final business day of 1948.

In the budget which the President submitted in the last session the amount scheduled for payment of interest on the national debt was $5,350,000,000. In the message just read to the House the requisition for interest on the debt is $5,725,000,000, an increase between the two budget messages of $375,000,000 per annum for interest alone.

During the fiscal year 1949 the full effect of the fiscal policies of the Eightieth Congress were brought to bear—new tax rates went into effect in May 1948, just 60 days before the beginning of fiscal year 1949. As a result it is now estimated the public debt will be $263,800,000,000 by the end of 1951. The interest charge alone in 1951 will aggregate $5,600,000,000.

Attention should again be called, however, to the fact just referred to that the budget as submitted contemplates additional revenue to be derived from increases in postal rates—not yet enacted by Congress—totaling $395,000,000. If this amount is not forthcoming then the public-debt increase will be that much greater.

It is a situation which warrants renewed and detailed scrutiny of the budget and all proposals involving expenditures, and justifies any possible improvement in methods of processing the appropriations.

Ever since the adoption of the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921, the committee has been seeking some practical method of submitting the annual appropriations in one over-all bill. Notably, under Chairman Swager Shirley of Kentucky and Committee Clerks Mark Sheild and John Pugh, extensive studies were inaugurated with this in view.

Finally, with the opening of the Eighty-first Congress, the first step was taken by the enlargement of the Committee on Appropriations to 45 members, making it possible to create nine subcommittees of five members each, and confining the service of each member to one committee and one bill, with the announcement that if the reorganization was successful, the nine bills would be consolidated into one bill in the second session of the Eighty-first Congress. The reorganization proved successful beyond expectation and the entire budget passed the House and was transmitted to the Senate before April 15, 1949, so well processed that practically no amendments of any importance were adopted in the House.

Plans for collaboration between the House and Senate on the omnibus bill were worked out last week by a joint conference between the deficiency subcommittees of the two Houses under which the hearings by the House subcommittees will be printed in sections, embracing each subdivision of the bill, and released to the press and sent to the Senate as rapidly as completed. Under this system the Senate hearings need be only an average of 10 days or 2 weeks behind the House hearings and will have been practically completed by the time the House bill is passed and messaged over.

The advantages of the one-package bill are obvious. Appropriations will be more carefully processed; duplications, overlapping and conflicts will be reconciled; legislative items will be eliminated; logrolling will be impracticable as all the cards will be on the table at one time and any attempted trades will be too apparent to withstand the light of publicity; the entire expenditures for the year will be submitted in one figure simultaneously with an authoritative estimate of the national income; deficit financing will be discouraged, as a last opportunity will be afforded for reconsideration in the subcommittees of the entire bill with a view of bringing annual expenditures within the annual revenues of the Government; and the bill will have been passed and all annual appropriations enacted before the end of the fiscal year, obviating the need for the usual continuing resolutions and permitting adjournment of Congress much earlier than heretofore. So far as the Presidential veto is concerned, the President will have precisely the same right and opportunity to veto the omnibus bill and return it for further consideration that he now has, and which he has exercised, in passing on the several bills formerly submitted by the Congress.

Adoption of the omnibus appropriation bill has been too long delayed. It has been in use in France, England, Sweden and other countries from the inception of parliamentary government. The need has been long realized in America and the announcement of its adoption here meets with universal approval from the press throughout the Nation, as indicated by the following editorial comment:

[From the Kansas City Times of December 28, 1949]

FOR MORE CARE WITH BILLIONS

Some day we might have a Congress that was honest enough with itself and honest enough with the people it represents to appropriate only the money there actually was to spend—not a dollar more. In peacetime certainly there is no legal, moral, or national security obligation to be used as an argument for any other course.

There could be no better time than the present for an honest start in the one direction. The opportunity is at hand in the proposal that all money bills be tied up into a single package and acted upon at one and the same time—when it is known how much money there will be to spend and when the pattern can be cut to fit the cloth.

That is closely akin to the policy that Congress is morally and legally obligated to follow and by virtue of its own considered action. Under the Congressional Reorganization Act adopted only 3 years ago for its own guidance—Congress is required to frame its own budget in the light of anticipated revenues. It is no excuse to say that it has not been done in the last 3 years, for the requirement is there and is just as strong as ever.

In the past the framing of a budget has been left wholly to the administration or the executive branch of the Government. It does not belong there any more than it belongs to Congress. In fact, it is more the duty of Congress because that body must say finally what shall be spent and for what purposes. That leaves upon Congress the burden of responsibility for what is done. The administration budget is only advisory and in the form of a recommendation—like all the other policies and programs that are laid before the legislative branch for its judgment and decisions.

As it has been and as it shouldn't be, Congress has taken up scores of appropriation bills separately. Each bill has been framed without any particular regard for the total revenue available and usually on the assumption that if any important cutting is to be done then some other committee and the Government agency or other interest behind it can do the trimming. Each is out to get what it can and the devil take the hindmost.

The result often is that near the end of a session there is accumulated a great mass of appropriations that might require billions more than would be at hand. It is loose and irresponsible business that should not be tolerated in running the biggest business in the Nation and the world.

Getting all the appropriations into a single bill would not in itself be a panacea but it would be an immense stride forward. Congress Members still would be human and politically minded. There could still be logrolling, back scratching, and trading back and forth. But these practices would not so easily produce the results that now can be had. With the grand total of appropriations clearly laid out along with the revenue to be at hand there would be more compulsion to line up in accordance with the facts. The public would be able to see clearly the whole set-up and who was responsible for trying to block a sensible and highly justified procedure.

The new idea has the approval of committee leaders who are in position to get it to work. So let's have it and give it a fair trial.

LEGISLATIVE BUDGETS

The chief advantage of the omnibus appropriation bill that is to take the place of multiple appropriation bills is that it will provide Congress with an over-all figure of the cost of proposed spending programs, based on the recommendations of its various Appropriations Committees. A consolidated bill embodying the results of such committee deliberations will not be ready for presentation until late in the session, when Congress will be in a better position to estimate the tax revenues of the next fiscal year. The Reorganization Act of 1946 provided that a joint congressional budget committee should report to Congress each year by February 15 a legislative budget for the coming fiscal year including estimates of total expenditures and receipts. The act also provided that the committee report should be accompanied by a concurrent resolution adopting this budget and fixing the maximum amount to be appropriated for expenditures. This legislative budget plan has proved unworkable, because it entailed setting an over-all spending figure at too early a date, in advance of detailed hearings on appropriation requests. Moreover, under the present system of piecemeal appropriations it is virtually impossible to keep total appropriations within a predetermined over-all figure.

The National Committee for Strengthening Congress, therefore, suggests that the Joint Budget Committee should review the items in the consolidated approriations bill and make a report to Congress about the first of May, embodying its own recommendations for increases or decreases in total appropriations or in revenue and/or increases or decreases in the public debt. Although this method of procedure would be an improvement on the present legislative budget plan, which requires the Joint Budget Committee to engage in a guessing contest, the committee would be of little use as an agent for intelligent control of spending unless it had made a continuous, intensive and independent study of the various appropriations measures included in the final appropriation bill. That kind of inquiry calls for a large staff of experts to examine estimates in detail and determine whether expenditures can be reduced without impairing efficiency and where they should be made.

[From the St. Louis (Mo.) Globe-Democrat of December 28, 1949]

ONE-PACKAGE BUDGET

Despite fears of logrolling among the legislative brethren, congressional leaders have decided to wrap up the budget in a single bill. This looks like a good idea. With all its obvious pitfalls, a one-package budget is worth another try.

The procedure of recent past sessions has certainly proved no panacea for budgeting. Appropriation measures have been drawn, considered, and passed separately. The President likes that system, for he can veto individual bills without blocking the entire budget. But the separate bill plan has helped throw the whole appropriation picture out of kilter.

Congress believes it would be better to consider the complete budget structure at once. Thus it can determine the over-all size of its annual appropriations and, like any good tailor, cut the cloth to fit the revenue pattern.

It is impossible to figure out a sound budget piecemeal. Unless the total is taken into all computations, certain features are bound to be overweighted and the possibility of a balance slim indeed. The last session proved this. With grandiose forecast, Congressmen set out to trim Presidential figures. They wound up adding more billions to the President's budget.

The logrolling propensities of solons are ever present whether there is a single bill or not. The mutual back-scratching activities of Congressmen will not be curtailed by a change in procedures, only a change in political nature. The pork-barrelling routine can exist when legislators trade votes for pet projects in an omnibus budget; they can and have done the same thing when allocation bills were separate.

Possibly the Presidential veto gets a slugging in the one-bill plan. The White House can only approve or veto the whole budget, not parts. It might be wise to grant the President the right of vetoing by item, so he could let the main budget pass and disapprove of individual allotments if he wanted. However, it must be remembered the basic power of appropriation under our Constitution lies with Congress.

It will be a tough job to balance the next budget. There would be a better chance of success if Congress tackles the chore in a single, composite bill.

WAY TO APPROPRIATIONS CUTS

New hopes for subsequent years have been inspired by announcement that the House Appropriations Committee will combine all appropriations in a single bill, beginning in the next session for fiscal 1951.

A single appropriation bill, its sponsors believe, should be more conducive to restraints upon the rising cost of government. * * *

Favorable action by Congress on a scheme for Executive cuts in expenditures for the coming fiscal year would be notice that the legislative branch is insistent on a balanced budget without any increase in taxation.

Failure of the administration to bring the budget into balance by reductions below authorized expenditure totals would throw the problem back into the hands of Congress in next winter's session. Lumping of all appropriations in a single bill should make it less difficult to hold expenditures within revenues, although by no means providing complete assurance of avoidance of a tax increase.

Abolition of the system of multiple appropriation bills is in line with efforts by the National Chamber to improve legislative machinery for control of expenditures.

A SINGLE FEDERAL BUDGET BILL

Chairman CANNON of the House Appropriations Committee says he will try next year to get all Federal appropriations into a single omnibus bill. Senator TAFT approves this step. Senator BYRD has long favored it. We hope that enough other influential Members of Congress will join these men to put the idea across.

The present practice of considering appropriations for departments singly, or of combining the appropriations for two or three departments, is bad because it tends to minimize in the congressional mind the staggering totals that are amassed in this piecemeal fashion.

Putting all appropriations in a single measure would keep the attention of Congress and the people on the total. Every change made, up or down, would be seen in its relation to the total, and to the taxes required to meet that total.

We are inclined to agree with Chairman CANNON that if we are able to have economy, we must first have this change in procedure. It is too easy now to slip in a few extra hundreds of millions here and there, without reckoning the ultimate cost and without comparing taxpayer benefits with the accompanying taxpayer burdens.

[From the Mobile (Ala.) Press Register]

CONGRESS SHOULDN'T LET BUDGET TALK CAUSE IT TO PASS UP BUDGET CUTTING

Congress has yet to give a final answer about cutting the Federal budget of almost $42,000,000,000 which the administration asks for the next fiscal year.

But in the meantime it has started talking about using a new approach to the budget for the year after that.

This proposed departure from customary budget practice in Congress contemplates a single-package appropriation bill—that is, all Government money bills would be lumped into a single measure.

The purpose to adopt that procedure for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1950, has just been announced by Representative CLARENCE CANNON (Democrat, Missouri), chairman of the House Appropriations Committee.

Under present practice, Congress deals with a flock of appropriation bills, or, as the United Press expresses it, the Government's annual budget "goes through Congress in a dozen or so separate bills and Federal agencies often come back later with 'deficiency' requests."

The new method which Congressman CANNON says will be offered for the 1951 fiscal year (to begin July 1, next year) is designed to do away with piecemeal handling of the budget.

In its report of Mr. CANNON's comment on the single-package proposal, the United Press related in a Washington dispatch:

"Announcing plans for the far-reaching reform to the House, he said it would enable Congress to see the over-all spending picture in a single frame and balance it against Government income.

"He said it would put squarely up to Congress the issue whether to keep within the Federal income or 'continue to spend more than our income and increase the stupendous national debt.'

"He also said the single-package plan would focus the Nation's attention on Government spending and help Members 'withstand pressure groups more successfully.'"

International News Service quoted Chairman CANNON, of the House Appropriations Committee, as making these remarks:

"When the consolidated [single-package] appropriation bill is presented we will also have an authoritative estimate of the national income.

"We can determine whether the budget is to be balanced with a surplus for debt retirement, or whether there is to be further deficit spending with increases in the national debt.

"There can be no side-stepping or shifting of responsibility on the question of whether we are to live within our income or continue, as during the war years, the spending policies which have boosted the national debt to unprecedented heights."

According to INS, "leaders of both major parties on Capitol Hill" applauded the proposal to lump into one bill all the Government appropriations for the 1951 fiscal year.

"Some obstacles were seen in the new plan," INS reported, "but the consensus was that the possible economies in Government spending make it a worthy undertaking."

Congressional comment aside from Mr. CANNON'S included that of Representative JOHN TABER, Republican, of New York, ranking minority member of the House Appropriations Committee and its chairman in the preceding Congress.

He said he considers the single-package appropriation proposal "worth trying," although he is not as enthusiastic about it as Chairman CANNON.

Most taxpayers, we are convinced, would like for Congress to try something to better safeguard against wasteful spending by the Federal Government.

Furthermore, while talking about budget procedure for the 1951 fiscal year, Congress should crack down against wasteful spending in the 1950 fiscal year soon to begin. But will it?

[From the Wall Street Journal]

A RAY OF HOPE

Chairman CANNON, of the House Appropriations Committee, has promised that next year Congress will get a clear look at what it is doing before it starts spending money.

It is easily done. No legislation or elaborate reorganization plan is required. The Appropriations Committees, while continuing separate hearings on individual spending bills, will simply bring them all to the floor in one bundle. Each Congressman can then see at one look the total amount of the money he is voting to spend.

This is a revolutionary idea. True, it has been long advocated by Senator BYRD and others alarmed at the loose spending practices of Congress, but because it is revolutionary—that is, it would upset old and comfortable customs—it has met heavy opposition. Many Congressmen, it would seem, prefer not to look at what they are doing.

The plan is no panacea for budget pains; it would not prevent Congress from voting as big a spending bill as it chooses to do. It does have the merit of bringing that body face to face with its extravagance. Under the present piece-by-piece method of appropriating extravagance can slip upon the Congress, and the public, unawares.

It won't empty the pork barrel, but it will bring it out in the open where we can see what's inside. And when everybody can look at it some surprising things may happen.

[From the Cleveland (Ohio) Plain Dealer]

APPROPRIATION PROCEDURE

Representative CANNON, the chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, has announced that next year all appropriation measures will be put into one bill so that the Members of Congress will have some idea of the total cost of the Federal Government when they authorize the expenditures.

Under existing procedure, Congress votes separately on a number of supply bills, each containing appropriations for one or more branches of the Government. Nobody can tell what the total cost will be until the last bill has been passed.

With an omnibus bill before it, CANNON pointed out, Congress could compare the total with the estimates of anticipated revenues. Such a comparison would show the need for either budget cuts or additional taxes or, in the case of a surplus, how much money could be applied on the national debt. It would also enable Congress "to more successfully withstand pressure groups and high-powered lobbies," CANNON said.

One flaw has been found in the proposal. The President would be unable to exercise his veto power over appropriations without disapproving the single financing measure for the entire Government.

This objection could be overcome if the Federal Government adopted the appropriation procedure in effect in Ohio and some of the other States. For years it has been the custom of the Ohio Legislature to lump general appropriations into one bill, but the State constitution gives the Governor the right to veto any item or items in any bill making an appropriation of money.

There is no similar provision in the Federal Constitution. An amendment probably would be necessary to give the President the power to veto specific items and this would take some time. But that is no reason why a trial of the omnibus appropriation procedure should be delayed.

[From the Cincinnati (Ohio) Post]

ONE BIG BILL INSTEAD OF ELEVEN

Representative CLARENCE CANNON, of Missouri, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, says that in the next session of Congress the whole Federal budget will be lumped into a single appropriation bill.

This is a reform long advocated by Senator BYRD, of Virginia. The Democratic leadership in Congress now apparently has accepted it, and many Republicans are said to be for it.

The Government's spending measures now go through Congress in 11 or more separate bills. Until the last of these is passed, which usually is just before a new fiscal year begins, Congress never knows accurately how much money it will vote for spending in that year.

Under the new plan, Mr. CANNON says, when the single bill is ready for passage, Congress will have an estimate of probable income and can either cut spending to stay within that income or determine to meet a deficit by voting higher taxes or increasing the stupendous public debt. "Thus," he promises, "there will be no sidestepping or shifting. The issue will be clear."

The change will be an improvement. Whatever may be hoped for from it, however, it won't help this year's situation, which finds most of Congress shouting for economy but voting for spending far in excess of probable Federal revenue and, at the same time, sidestepping higher taxes.

[From the Washington (D. C.) Post]

ALL IN ONE

Chairman CANNON, of the House Appropriations Committee, plans to put all appropriation items next year into a single omnibus bill that would give Congress an over-all view of the spending program. His proposal has bipartisan support within the committee and is hailed by Senator TAFT as a step in the right direction. Senator BYRD has long advocated the use of a single appropriation bill of this kind, pointing out that the practice of passing separate appropriation bills over a period of several months is a legislative handicap that prevents Congress from considering the budget as a whole and making intelligent reductions in expenditures.

The Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 attempted to put a ceiling on spending in advance of detailed appropriation requests. But the proposed legislative budget has never been put into effect. To estimate total expenditures early in the session before spending plans were fully known proved an impossible task. Moreover, the Budget Committee did not have a staff equipped to do the work entailed in studying and revising budget estimates. The present Congress decided to defer the date for agreement on the legislative budget to May 1 and ended by doing nothing at all about it. The failure of this effort to establish some sort of comprehensive control over fiscal policy adds to the feeling of frustration that overwhelms many Congressmen who believe that Government spending must be curtailed, but lack the information needed to reduce expenditures without impairing essential services. Consequently, there is growing support for the type of omnibus bill that Mr. CANNON is proposing.

Opponents of the plan fear that it might result in undue delay in passing appropriation measures. But if both House and Senate held hearings on spending proposals concurrently the Senate would be ready to act promptly on the final measure approved by the House. Another objection to the plan is that it would bar the President from exercising his right to veto appropriation measures, since the veto of an omnibus bill would leave the Government without any funds for carrying on operations. However, the exercise of the veto power in case of appropriation bills always creates grave disturbances and is seldom resorted to. If the President ventured to veto an unacceptable omnibus bill, the very gravity of the resultant emergency would doubtless insure prompt remedial action.

In our opinion, the need for a control measure of this kind has been convincingly demonstrated. Improved machinery for control of expenditures will not, as the recent CED report on tax and expenditure policy says, assure wise congressional action. But without such machinery Congress cannot be expected to act wisely. An omnibus appropriation bill is, of course, only one means of giving Congress a better insight into fiscal problems. Budget and accounting reforms, such as those recommended by the Hoover Commission, are also imperative if legislators are to know what specific spending projects will actually cost in any given year and in succeeding years.

LUMPING APPROPRIATIONS

There is a lot of merit in the plan to consolidate all of next year's regular appropriation bills into an omnibus measure. The idea has been advanced at several sessions of Congress by Senator BYRD without success. It is encouraging, therefore, to learn that Chairman CANNON, of the House Appropriations Committee, intends to press for adoption of the single-bill proposal at the next session. He has considerable bipartisan support.

It is now clear that Congress has abandoned hope of bringing appropriation and revenue bills into some sort of balance through a legislative budget scheme. The budget system, authorized by the Congressional Reorganization Act, has proved to be unworkable. It was found that it was infeasible to set a spending limit at the outset of a session because it is impossible to estimate accurately the needs of departments in advance of hearings.

Frustrated in the budgeting approach, Mr. CANNON tried a new tack this year. He instituted simultaneous hearings on the major departmental appropriation bills, with a view of having all of them reported at approximately the same time, so that Congress would have at least a general over-all idea of what it was appropriating. The simultaneous hearings were made possible by reassigning subcommittee membership so that each member of the Appropriations Committee served on only one subcommittee.

The single-bill plan would carry the simultaneous-hearing arrangement a logical step further. By wrapping up all the departmental appropriations in one package, Congress would have before it the grand total of proposed expenditures. Thus it would know exactly how much money would have to be raised to avoid a deficit. Under the old piecemeal system of voting on appropriations, the legislators had only a hazy conception of what the spending might amount to. Usually when the last appropriation was made and the costs were summed up, it was found that appropriations far exceeded original estimates of revenues that would be available.

There is urgent need for some method of bringing appropriations under over-all scrutiny and control. The loose procedures of the past have imposed upon the taxpayers huge deficits that might have been avoided had Congress operated along sound business lines. The omnibus appropriation plan offers some hope of relief.

[From the Baltimore (Md.) Sun]

ANOTHER PROPOSAL TO TIGHTEN CONGRESS' CONTROL OF THE PURSE

Representative CANNON gives the country good news when he announces that beginning next year the House Appropriations Committee will work out a consolidated general appropriation bill. To sense the scope and significance of this proposal, a little background has to be recalled.

The main trouble has been that the size of the budget problem has forced a division of budget labor by which appropriations are broken up into 12 or more separate bills, each assigned to a subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations. Over a period of up to 6 months these 12 subcommittees work in complete independence of each other. The revenue committees also work independently. Finally the practice has grown up of extending expenditures beyond the years for which the appropriating legislation is primarily passed.

The result has been that no Congressman not intimately engaged in the budgeting procedure has had a clear idea of what the Government was spending, for what purposes, in what year. If Members of Congress were completely at sea on these issues, the public was even worse off. In 1946 Congress tried to ease the situation in the legislative budget clauses of the Legislative Reorganization Act.

The idea of the legislative budget was simply that the Appropriation and the Tax Committees of the two Houses would get together and work out an appropriation total which would fit within the proposed ceiling of the prospective tax take. This was an excellent idea and it was embraced with enthusiasm in these columns and elsewhere. But many backers of the legislative budget overlooked the continuing fact that those 12 subcommittees still ground out those 12 separate appropriation bills in complete independence.

This is where the new proposal of Representative CANNON comes into the picture. Mr. CANNON says that the House Appropriations Committee will consolidate the several appropriation bills into one over-all general budget bill which it will present to the Congress at one time.

This over-all appropriation bill will contain rigid limits on the expenditures to be made in the given fiscal year, so that the wide margin between appropriations and actual expenditures which has so obscured budget clarity will be narrowed. And the over-all budget will afford just that total appropriation figure which the framers of the legislative-budget law desired to balance out against prospective tax yields.

Bugs in the new scheme will undoubtedly turn up. But it aims at one of the major obstacles on which the legislative budget of 1946 foundered. It is another step toward a revivification of the ancient doctrine that Congress should control spending and that the people, who elect Congress, should understand the congressional control. And that doctrine was never so vital as in an age of $40,000,000,000 budgets.

In conclusion, by way of summary, we have:

[In billions of dollars]

Pending before Congress for action:	Appropriations	Expenditures
Pending before Congress for action:
In budget as submitted	28.8	23.6
To be submitted	5.5	3.2
Total to be acted upon	34.3	26.8
Permanent appropriations (preponderantly interest on public debt)	5.9	5.8
Total, new budget	40.2	32.6
Expenditures from other sources:
Previous appropriations obligated and carried forward		7.0
Public-debt transaction, etc		2.8
Total expenditures, 1951		42.4
Estimated receipts		37.3
Deficit		5.1

The foregoing table indicates that the Committee on Appropriations will have before it a total of $34,300,000,000 in estimates for consideration and that of these estimates only $26,800,000,000 will be expended in 1951, the remainder of the total expenditure contemplated for 1951—$13,600,000,000—to come from other sources beyond the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations. Therefore it will be necessary to reduce the estimates before the committee by nearly $7,000,000,000 if a balanced budget is to be achieved through reduction of the estimates of direct annual appropriation and the Committee on Appropriations is to be expected to take full responsibility for putting the Treasury in the black.

Of the total amount of $34,300,000,000 to be considered by the Committee on Appropriations the following large items are outstanding:

	In billions of dollars
National defense	13.0
Veterans' benefits	6.0
Foreign aid and international affairs	5.0
Total	24.9

National defense situation is such as to require consideration of major policy matters which must be permitted—to some extent at least—to outweigh cold budgetary requirements. That is, there must be some consideration other than merely the number of dollars on hand at the particular time to determine the amount of national defense we will purchase. On the other hand there is no occasion to so close our eyes to budgetary restrictions as to purchase national defense on a basis which will in a few years result in our having nothing left to defend, by reason of having exhausted our resources so completely in an all out defense effort as to have destroyed our economy.

Veterans benefits cannot be reduced by the Committee on Appropriations materially as such benefits are provided by law and whatever amounts are due must be paid. If any change is to be made in this area it will have to be made by the legislative committee.

In the foreign field we have certain commitments which must be honored in order to maintain our standing among nations. Regardless of how any Member may feel about the policy or about whether we should originally have made commitments, the fact remains that we are committed and whatever the cost, we must pay. Of course the committee will scrutinize such requests carefully to be certain no more is provided than is necessary to meet obligations incurred and to insure continuation of those programs, which have so far proven effective in maintaining the peace of the world and in preventing the spread of ideologies which have for their purpose the destruction of democratic principles.

In view of these facts this is no time to talk about new charges against the general revenues. Before we embark on new programs we must go back and survey the old ones and find what we can do about eliminating those which have outlived their usefulness and reducing the cost of others. Presentation of all proposed expenditures simultaneously in one bill will contribute materially to that end.

It is the plan to include in the report accompanying the omnibus bill not only proposed appropriation figures but expenditure figures as well. Thus we put aside piecemeal consideration of appropriation measures, formulated without knowing what the ultimate aggregate of Treasury demands might be, and determine in the light of up-to-the-minute projected Treasury receipts how far we can go in drafting demands upon such receipts, taking into consideration, of course, requirements without the compass of the omnibus bill.

The new performance-type budget is a long step forward. Recommended by the Hoover Commission, and concurred in by leading budgetary and fiscal experts, both in and out of the Government, it should serve as a further factor in holding Government expenditures to the minimum. As has been well said, "For the first time the budget estimates have been prepared according to a pattern based on logic instead of one based on antiquated custom." However, the performance-budget plan, marking a great step in advance as it does, is not a perfected system in itself. There must be cooperation. It is particularly important that accounting systems of the various agencies be modernized and geared to the new budget concept in order that actual cost data can be supplied as basis for future budgets.

The Citizens Committee for the Hoover report announced on October 16, 1949, that 20 percent of the Hoover Commission recommendations had been enacted into law, resulting in annual savings of $1,250,000,000. The budget will be reviewed to be certain these savings are translated into actual dollars and reflected in the accounts of the agencies affected.

The omnibus bill of itself will not be a panacea for all of the ills which prompt its inauguration. There is no substitute for laborious and searching inquiries, for analyses and studies, by members of the Appropriation Committees of the two Houses, or for selfless interest and courage exercised by them and other Members of the two bodies when the bill is before them for consideration or when legislative bills are under consideration, whether in committee or on the floor, which would impose new and additional drafts upon the Federal Treasury. These are requisites to the attainment of proper and effective congressional budgeting and their importance cannot be too heavily stressed. We cannot have economy in government under any system without patriotic interest and courage on the part of those charged with the duties of raising and spending revenue in providing for the support of the Government.

It might also be added that economy neither begins nor ends in the halls of Congress. The budget must submit estimates of minimum requirements to accomplish the work proposed on the most economical basis possible and, after the appropriations are made the executive branch of the Government must assume responsibility for operating at the most economical level and returning to the Treasury such savings as it is possible to effect in administration.

Mr. Speaker, it would be futile to attempt to make reduction prophecies. We cannot at this time make even tentative estimates of amounts to be spent or saved. Prophesying ahead of detailed consideration was the fatal defect in the legislative budget contemplated by the Legislative Reorganization Act. It may be said, however, that the 1951 budget is susceptible to reduction. You have never yet seen a budget that could not be cut and which was not cut. You may depend upon the Committee on Appropriations to cut estimates to the lowest amounts consistent with international requirements and the essential needs of the Government generally. It will then be for the House to review and pass judgment upon our determinations.

(Mr. CANNON asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include certain newspaper editorials commending the adoption of the omnibus-appropriation-bill idea.)

BUDGET ESTIMATES FOR RIVERS AND HARBORS AND FLOOD CONTROL PROJECTS

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a statement containing the approved budget estimates for the fiscal year 1951 for rivers and harbors and flood-control projects which will be the subject for hearings before my subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations within the near future.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, the budget message of the President will be presented to this body today. It will contain estimates of amounts required to run the Government for the coming fiscal year and requests that such amounts be appropriated. One of the programs coming within the purview of the requests is that of the civil functions administered by the Corps of Engineers, Department of the Army. It has been my privilege to be associated with this program for a number of years and it is with considerable pride that I view the accomplishments of this program. Prior to World War II the program was started and without the completion of numerous of the items under the program the power to produce the necessary munitions of war that made this Nation so outstanding in its contribution to the final outcome of that conflict could not have been accomplished. Since the close of that war the program has again been started and many individual projects have been completed and are now adding to the wealth of this Nation daily. With each annual appropriation many more projects are completed, as is quite noticeable from a comparison of the present list of projects with those placed in the record by me a year ago—many of those included in last year's list having been completed, the program here presented will provide the funds to complete many others:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KING (at the request of Mr. O'HARA of Illinois) was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a report by the Secretary of Commerce to the White House on conditions on the west coast.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address by Matthew Woll at the Gompers Centennial dinner.

UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND REHABILITATION ADMINISTRATION JOINT RESOLUTION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 437)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read by the Clerk and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith the twentieth quarterly report of expenditures and operations under the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration Joint Resolution, Public Law 267, Seventy-eighth Congress, approved March 28, 1944. This report covers the period from April 1, 1949, through June 30, 1949.

In view of the fact that the United States appropriations for participation in UNRRA expired for expenditure purposes on June 30, 1949, this is the last report which will be submitted.

The unexpended balance of $2,642,209.08 remaining under the United States appropriations will revert to the surplus fund in the United States Treasury. Any unpaid claims against this balance are subject to presentation to the General Accounting Office for direct settlement in the usual manner.

REPORT OF SECRETARY OF STATE—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 438)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read by the Clerk and, together with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State, showing all receipts and disbursements on account of refunds, allowances, and annuities for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1949, in connection with the Foreign Service retirement and disability system as required by section 862, Foreign Service Act of 1946 (Public Law 724).

TWENTY-NINTH REPORT ON LEND-LEASE OPERATIONS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 436)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read by the Clerk and, together with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am transmitting herewith the Twenty-ninth Report to Congress on Lend-Lease Operations, for the quarter ending June 30, 1949.

This report contains in appendix I a report on Lend-Lease Fiscal Operations, prepared by the Treasury Department and submitted to the Secretary of State in accordance with Executive Order 9726. This fiscal report covers the period from March 11, 1941, through June 30, 1949.

In April 1949 the Dominican Republic and Venezuela completed payment of their accounts under their respective lend-lease agreements.

A settlement agreement was signed with Ethiopia on May 20, 1949, and appears in this report as appendix II.

On September 27, 1949, understanding was reached with Soviet representatives as to the dates and procedures for the return of 3 icebreakers and 27 frigates of the United States Navy which had been made available to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics under lend-lease. Negotiations with the Soviet Union on other lend-lease matters have resulted in some progress but as yet there has been no substantial agreement on several of the major issues.

Other lend-lease activities during the period covered by this report included the continuation of final settlement negotiations and other winding-up activites, described more fully in the report itself.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 9, 1950.

(Enclosure: Twenty-ninth Report to Congress on Lend-Lease Operations.)

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

JANUARY 9, 1950.

The Honorable SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE, SAM RAYBURN.

SIR: I hereby inform you of my resignation from the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs to take effect upon approval by the House of Representatives.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES T. PATTERSON,
Member of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MACY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement made by him last Thursday on the occasion of the visit of the Freedom Train.

Mr. MANSFIELD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. TABER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KEE] is recognized for 20 minutes.

SPAIN

Mr. KEE. Mr. Speaker, I regret that other demands on my time and energies prevented me from joining my colleagues who studied the problems of United States foreign policy at first hand in the field during the interval between the sessions of the Congress. Had I been able to go, I should certainly have included Spain in my schedule. I should have done so out of regard for the charm of that country and its people and out of regard also for the importance of the Spanish question in United States foreign policy.

The working out of a positive policy with regard to Spain, to succeed the present policy we are pursuing there, will call for the closest working together between the executive and legislative branches of the Government. I speak today at my own instance. The ideas I present are essentially my own. My purpose is to assist the better understanding of problems that are all too often confused in public discussion.

Much confusion results from the fact that many substantial questions regarding relations with Spain are coming up concurrently with the question whether to send an ambassador back to Madrid. The latter question, however, is quite apart from the questions of political, economic, and strategic relations concerning Spain. It will serve to clarify the problems of our Spanish policy if we talk of them separately.

I have seen and heard many references to the desirability of recognizing the Franco government.

The fact is, this Government recognized the Franco regime on April 1, 1939. It did so in keeping with the traditional United States approach to recognition. If a regime has the power to govern, it is a government. If it is willing to assume the burdens of government in dealings with other governments, it qualifies for recognition. Recognition is a neutral thing. It should imply neither approval nor disapproval of the regime receiving it. It should imply only what the term means—recognition of the facts about a government's status and power.

In the past we have sometimes deviated from this principle. We have sometimes acted as if recognition carried a moral value and as if the withholding of recognition applied a moral sanction. When we have done so, we have usually involved ourselves in more problems than we solved. But all that is beside the point here. Our recognition of the Franco government has continued without a break since April 1, 1939. The question now is not one of recognition. It is whether we should continue to leave our affairs in Spain in the hands of a counselor of embassy who is chargé d'affaires or should soon send a person with the title of ambassador to take over as chief of our mission.

This does not reflect on the abilities of the present chargé d'affaires. His name is Paul Culbertson. He has done an excellent job. From my colleagues who visited Spain I have heard nothing but praise of him. But a chargé d'affaires is accredited only to the chief of a foreign office. An Ambassador is accredited to the chief of a state. This distinction sometimes makes a difference. In the months to come it may be distinctly to our advantage to have our chief of mission in Madrid vested with such office as will permit him access to the chief of the Spanish state.

I hasten to add, however, that it is not a proposiiton that can be settled in the abstract. Equally important with the question of whether to send back an Ambassador is the question, Who shall he be? I have no name to recommend. I have certain qualifications in mind. He must have breadth, finesse, and force of character equal to a great task. He must have the balance to avoid the localism of view that often affects Ambassadors. He must be able to deal with Spanish problems in their context as part of our European policy. I do not believe that we can afford a Spanish policy that does not fit in with our western European policy. A solution of issues with Spain is devoutly to be desired—but not at the price of impairing our objectives among Spain's neighbors. Our next envoy must be broad in his comprehension of our objectives and resolute in his devotion to them. The American public must have complete faith in his disposition to represent them 100 percent of the way. I trust that those who shall select him when the proper time comes will let themselves be satisfied with nothing less than the best. With an envoy of such caliber in Madrid, we should find the restoration of an Ambassador there much to our advantage.

Will we find it in any respects to our disadvantage to restore full representation? I do not think so. The purpose behind our action in withholding an Ambassador from Madrid has not been borne out. The purpose was sound. The means have proved inappropriate. We might as well admit this.

Let us review the circumstances behind the withholding of an Ambassador from Madrid.

The Franco government came to power as the result of a civil war beginning in the summer of 1936 and lasting through the spring of 1939. The war had been fought with great ruthlessness and enormous bloodshed. Estimates of its dead varied from 1,000,000 to 2,000,000—roughly from 4 to 8 percent of the total population. Even at this great sacrifice, the Spaniards had not been allowed to settle their own issues. Military assistance on behalf of Franco had been poured in by the Axis Powers and on behalf of the Republic by the Soviet Union. Who would have won if there had been no foreign intervention? It is an academic question. The fact is that the Republic was defeated and the Axis-supported forces, led by Generalissimo Francisco Franco, emerged victorious.

This event was overtaken by the wider tragedy of the World War. During this war Spain followed a course that one might charitably call an ambiguous neutrality. From time to time Franco hailed the cause of his Axis benefactors, particularly in the period before the tide began to turn against the Axis Powers. Nevertheless, Spain's needs were too great, its strength too spent, and the risks of outrightly joining the war too formidable. Hostilities closed with Franco still in power and aloof from direct participation in the struggle.

What should be the orientation as to Spain of the victorious powers? It was agreed at the San Francisco Conference establishing the United Nations that states whose governments had been assisted to power by the Axis should be barred from membership. The Potsdam Conference echoed this action in the following words:

> The three governments feel bound, however, to make it clear that they for their part would not favor any application for membership put forward by the present Spanish Government, which, having been founded with the support of the Axis Powers, does not, in view of its origins, its nature, its record, and its close association with the aggressor states, possess the qualifications necessary to justify such membership.

The first meeting of the General Assembly of the United Nations, meeting in London in February 1946, endorsed the earlier action of the San Francisco Conference.

The subject of Spain was discussed at length in the Security Council in April 1946, the issue developing between those nations which were willing to continue to hold Spain at arm's length and those which wished to take definitive action of a character to force a show-down with Franco's government. The issue was continued into the General Assembly meeting in December 1946, with the outcome a resolution, passed on December 12, 1946, recommending—

> That the Franco government of Spain be debarred from membership in international agencies established by or brought into relationship with the United Nations and from participation in conferences or other activities which may be arranged by the United Nations or by these agencies, until a new and acceptable government is formed in Spain.
> That all members of the United Nations immediately recall from Madrid their ambassadors and ministers plenipotentiary accredited there.

That resolution stands. A reaffirmation of it offered in the General Assembly in November 1947, failed to elicit the necessary two-thirds vote. On the other hand, a resolution proposing to leave member states free to determine the matter of diplomatic representation for themselves likewise failed to win the necessary two-thirds vote in the General Assembly in May 1949.

I suppose the member nations are free to do so anyway. The General Assembly resolution of December 12, 1946, is a recommendation, not an edict. Several members of the United Nations have restored their envoys to Madrid in the meantime. These are Argentina, Bolivia, the Dominican Republic, Nicaragua, Peru, El Salvador, Haiti, Iceland, Lebanon, and Paraguay. Brazil, Colombia, Egypt, and Iraq have announced their intention of doing so. The resolution has failed of its intent to bring about and maintain a united front among United Nations members on the matter of the level of diplomatic relations with Spain. To that degree its value as a moral demonstration has failed.

It has failed also in that it has produced the effect of strengthening rather than weakening the Spanish Government with its own people. I should hesitate to assess the degree in which it has done so. Yet even the most sullen opponents of the regime within Spain have national pride as Spaniards. That pride was pricked by the action of other nations in passing a moral resolution about Spanish affairs. The action resulted in popular demonstration of support for a government that had been singularly denied such manifestations except insofar as it had been able to drum them up among its claque. I do not suggest that the Spanish reaction was such as to give the Government a basis of free consent among those it governs. It remains the one government in western Europe so lacking in self-confidence that it dares not test its mandate in a free election. But for the moment at least, following the General Assembly action, Spaniards freely voiced support of their dictator.

The primary decision about sending an ambassador back to Madrid is, of course, constitutionally one for the Executive to make. My own view is that such action on his part will be in order as soon as the way has been cleared through rescission of the General Assembly's resolution and that it is in the interest of this country to support such a rescission. I believe that we can afford to wait for such clearance. Also, I believe that we should coordinate our action with our allies among those nations which live in proximity with Spain. We have engaged in the closest economic collaboration with Spain's neighbors. With many of them we are engaged in a permanent defensive alliance of the most far-reaching character. We should not act precipitately and alone in dealing with the Spanish issue. We should not act in such a way as to weaken in the slightest degree our unity with the nations with which we have entered into great commitments.

Finally, let us make it very clear to ourselves and to the world, and to Spain in particular, what is involved and not involved in the restoration of an Ambassador.

The question whether or not an Ambassador represents a particular nation at a particular foreign capital should be divorced so far as possible from considerations of value in international affairs. As a means of expressing disapproval, the calling home of an Ambassador is not an effective action. It is a particularly inadequate means of dealing with a fundamental cleavage such as was involved in the issue with Spain. If the end of the regime is the end in view, then such action is of too little moment. But if the end of the regime is not the end sought, then the recall of an Ambassador must always be followed by the question whether and when to send him back. That involves a government in what Elihu Root called the danger of shaking a fist and then a finger. The idea of fastening a moral value to the question of withdrawing an envoy is likely to carry with it as a counterpart the idea of moral approval when one restores the envoy. We must avoid this impression. The differences between the Franco government and us are still fundamental differences. We still have reasons for disapproving many attributes of that government. To recognize the inappropriateness of the steps we took in concert with other nations does not mean that we are changing our minds about the ends. Let us not deceive ourselves that the sending back of an envoy will perceptibly alter the status of the substantial problem between Spain and the United States.

In the weeks to come we may expect much irrelevant argument as to these basic problems.

I expect to hear it said many times that the Spanish dictator is a man of impeccable personal life, that he is devout in his practices, and exudes charm. All of this I do not doubt.

The question will be asked: Since we manage to get along with Great Britain, to deal with France, to cooperate with Italy, to collaborate with Portugal, to do business with the governments of the low countries and the Scandinavian kingdoms, then why cannot we cooperate with Franco, who is a man of such unquestionably high character. That is the form in which the question was recently put to me. It is interesting to note how often people refer to Spain by the name of its dictator.

My only answer is that our recent experience has taught us many times over the difficulty of dealing with countries that go under the name of a man.

Many told us that Mussolini made trains run on time and that in his name the Italian state had been brought to heights of renewed greatness. All this was a delusion. That mercurial and very limited man led his great nation to tragedy and despair. It is only with his passing from the scene in defeat that one may speak confidently again of stable relations with Italy.

We were told that we could do business with Hitler. But the whole world learned through the process of a horrible ordeal that it could not.

During the bitter years since World War II we have been trying in vain to find a basis of collaboration with a government which has taken on the characteristics of a man named Stalin. It has been a disillusioning experience.

I might go on with other examples. No, the experience of recent years is such as to make us wary of dealing closely with nations which are personified in the character of arbitrary rulers. One of the best qualities of responsible constitutional government, as opposed to personal dictatorship, is that it gives ground for stable relations in international affairs. We look in vain for such characteristics in the present regime in Spain.

As to Generalissimo Franco's honesty and devoutness, I wish only to comment that the temptations of office are not so likely to be pecuniary temptations as they are to be temptations of power. Baron Acton observed: "All power corrupts, and absolute power corrupts absolutely." I can understand how a soldier seizing power after a military revolt may continue to be tenacious of it for 11 years. At the same time I cannot forego regretting that he continually uses his authority to impede any constructive alternative to his regime.

In discussing the Spanish issue let us not permit the personal qualities of Spain's dictator to obscure the true nature of the regime. It is based upon monopoly of political status by one party—the Falange—which is an authoritarian and monopolistic party in every sense. It maintains exclusive control over the channels of public expression. It has exclusive management of the process of election. No free electoral process and no independent judiciary exist to temper its rule. Free public opinion is not allowed. Labor is permitted to organize only in state-dominated and party-dominated syndicates. Spain is, in brief, a Fascist state. Its Government is made not in precise conformity with the examples of its Axis sponsors, but certainly in their general image.

In the unfolding discussion of the Spanish problem we shall hear much also of the question of religious freedom. This is a delicate and highly charged topic. Discussion of it is all too likely to generate more heat than light. We should avoid saying those things which are likely to aggravate the difficulties of the problem.

Religious equality and the secular state, as we understand them, are, of course, not part of the Spanish tradition. Spain has established one church in a position of official monopoly, has included its prelates in its council of the realm and its regency council, and subsidizes its clergy. The Spanish labor charter makes legally obligatory the keeping of traditional feasts of that church. The Falange, the only party permitted to exist in Spain, has declared the identity of its mission and the mission of the official church. The Spanish Government places the sanction of the state behind the hierarchy of the official church in preserving uniformity of religion and in restricting nonconforming publications and books.

Spaniards who choose to align themselves with minority religious groups—there are between 25,000 and 30,000 who do so—may not send their children to schools of their own choice. Minority groups may not have their own schools; religious instruction in the state religion is compulsory in the state schools. Minority groups are denied opportunity of public manifestation of their faith. Their worship must be in private. Their chapels may exist only at the sufferance of a government which maintains for itself the power to limit and regulate all exercise of minority faiths.

Worship is now permitted in 163 chapels of minority Christian sects, as compared with 166 such chapels as of 15 years ago, and in 2 Jewish chapels. Issues regarding the opening of chapels have been raised between the British and the Spanish Governments, but I believe there are no such issues now outstanding between our Government and Spain.

In respect to restrictions placed upon minority religious groups, Spain presents an anomaly in western Europe. Law and administration establish a pattern of discriminations that impinges upon freedom of conscience and freedom of worship as we understand these terms. At the same time, Spain can be said to be free of religious persecution in the sense of the employment of force as an instrument of the state in coercing conformity. Furthermore, one should acknowledge that administration has in some degree ameliorated the situation of minorities in recent months.

We shall hear many diagnoses of Spain's economic ills. We shall hear of the benefits to Spain's welfare and to our trade obtainable if we but lubricate the channels of commerce with a loan. I do not doubt that passing benefits to commerce might be achieved by a loan to Spain. I should hesitate to say, however, that such a loan is now a sound proposition. An answer to that question calls for a more thorough appraisal than I can make without long study. In any event, Spain is not foreclosed from a loan through our normal channels, provided Spain can qualify. The fact is that Spain since the close of World War II has not applied for a loan from the regular institutions of our Government set up for that purpose.

The matter of a loan to Spain is of secondary importance in the whole context of Spain's commerce. Spain is impoverished. In this condition Spain has resorted to a rigid system of state controls. This is not unusual in the European picture. What distinguishes the Spanish situation is the extremes and abuses which abound in the system of controls and the failure to take corrective action regarding the tendencies which make controls necessary.

First of all, the maintenance of a prohibitive exchange rate hampers normal trade. This is true in particular as to trade between Spain and the United States. Rather than seek a realistic readjustment, the Spanish Government has resorted to export subsidies on such commodities as cork and almonds. This in turn has precipitated the use of countervailing duties in keeping with our customs regulations. The price factor has inhibited the development of a foreign market in handicrafts, pottery, and many other such items. It has retarded the tourist trade. It has inhibited the repatriation of Spanish-owned dollar capital from other parts of the world.

Spain needs foreign investment, particularly American investment, to obtain dollar capital for machinery and for technical talent. Yet, Spain limits capital participation by foreigners in industrial concerns to 25 percent and prohibits foreign participation in management altogether. Exchange is generally withheld for profit repatriation. This virtually interdicts the reinvestment of frozen profits in plant expansion.

Foreign investors are subjected, moreover, to other harassments of peculiar and far-reaching character.

One example of Spanish practices which discourage the participation of foreign capital is that of permitting the same individual to serve as an entrepreneur in a particular field and as a Government administrator of regulations, particularly allocations, covering the same field. The invariable result is, of course, discrimination against foreign competitors.

A further circumstance is the fixing of price controls on the basis of a cost-of-living index without regard to costs of production—a practice which forces many manufacturers to resort to the black market with a portion of their product in order to stay in business.

As an example of another type of difficulty I cite the recent action of a Spanish court in declaring bankrupt the Barcelona Traction Co., a Canadian corporation, on the ground that the company could not pay its sterling bond interest. The case has been quite fully covered in the American press. This decision was made notwithstanding the fact that the company had at hand the equivalent of some $16,000,000 in pesetas—more than enough to meet its obligations—and was interdicted from meeting the bond interest solely because of the refusal of the Spanish authorities to authorize the conversion. This company, perfectly solvent in Spain and unable to meet its obligations only because of action of the Spanish Government, was declared bankrupt only as a pretext for enabling a Spanish financier to wrest control of it away from its owners.

I could go on with the details regarding the plight of foreign oil companies whose operations, permissible up to 40 percent of Spain's total petroleum trade as against 60 percent allowed to the Spanish monopoly, have been put under increasing pressure through restriction of foreign exchange available to them. It might be well also to explore the particular discriminations laid against the American motion-picture trade and American shipping.

But such illustrations would only add to the general picture of a national commerce suffering from an overdose of restriction administered with a deficiency of common sense. A loan to Spain might palliate, but it would not cure the fundamental ill.

The nature of the regime in Spain and the nature of freedom and the status of property under it are important as they bear upon the larger problem of how to fit Spain into the general picture of our western European policy.

Some take a simple approach to this larger problem. Spain, they argue, is anti-Communist. Our policy is that of containing international communism. Therefore, they conclude, let us embrace Spain within our undertakings for western Europe.

That is deceptively simple.

If our policy were merely anti-Communist, there would have been no reason, no justification for fighting World War II. We should simply have suffered Hitler and Mussolini to organize the world in the Nazi-Fascist pattern.

Our policy is based—and if it is to succeed, it must be based—not simply on the negative premise of anticommunism but on the affirmative premise of freedom.

Look into the declaration of policy of the Economic Cocperation Act of 1948, as amended. It speaks of the restoration and maintenance within Europe "of principles of individual liberty, free institutions, and genuine independence." It states the policy of this nation "to sustain and strengthen principles of individual liberty, free institutions, and genuine independence." Such is made the end objective of our foreign assistance and of the political and economic pattern which it seeks to create.

The North Atlantic Treaty echoes the same thoughts. Its preamble declares the common determination of the members "to safeguard the freedom of their peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty, and the rule of law."

The Mutual Defense Assistance Act speaks in the same vein. It requires assistance in the North Atlantic area to be conducted in conformity with the North Atlantic Treaty. It recognizes the relationship between security and recovery in that the former promotes "the increased confidence of free peoples" so essential to the realization of the latter.

Simply to be anti-Communist is not enough to qualify for participation in these great designs. To combat one negation of freedom with an alternative negation of freedom is simply not enough.

I believe the Spaniards themselves recognize this better than it is recognized by many of the apologists for Spain in this country.

Inherently there is no bar to the participation of Spain in the European recovery program. The legislation does not bar Spain. The charter of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation does not bar Spain. Spain is barred simply by the nature of the regime and by the methods Spain has chosen for the conduct of international relationships. Were Spain to transform its government and mend its ways, bringing itself into harmony with the general patterns of western Europe, I am sure that the other nations of that region and this Nation as well would welcome Spain as a full partner in the great undertakings.

But Spain's membership under present conditions would be an anomaly. I find in the Spanish press—keep in mind that it is an official and controlled press—and in the pronouncements of Spain's Government an implicit recognition of this. Spain offers itself as a beneficiary of United States aid not as a part of the grand pattern of American policy in Europe but as an alternative to that pattern.

Two years ago, when we first debated the European recovery program, there was an urgency among some in this country to precipitate Spain into the fellowship of western Europe by explicitly stating its eligibility. More recently, however, the proposals for assistance to Spain have taken the form of suggested loans outside the framework of the European recovery program.

The Spanish press and the Spanish Government have shown a quickening interest in this line of procedure. They have looked longingly upon the degree of recovery attained among the participants in the European recovery program. How to share in the benefits without paying the price of democratic collaboration? That has been the question which Spain's Government has sought to solve.

Since Spain could not, without transforming its regime, fit itself into the pattern of western Europe, Spain has sought to impress upon the United States the opportunity to help Spain on different terms.

The approach through the direct channels of public policy was difficult. So Spain's Government sought an avenue to satisfaction of its desires by courting public opinion in the United States. Public relations were substituted for public policy.

It is an old failing of dictatorships to believe their own propaganda about the weaknesses and vanities of democratic peoples. They become bemused by telling themselves so much about our inconstancy and our susceptibility to blandishments.

The Spaniards are fine hosts, capable of great deference and great charm in all personal relationships. Certainly no people ranks higher in American esteem in matters of personal liking. Spain is, in the American mind, a land of color, romance, and great personal courage. If personal responsiveness to foreign charm were to be the measure by which we decide matters of great moment in foreign policy, then certainly assistance to Spain would be with the topmost on the list of American concerns abroad.

We have, however, a well-considered program for western Europe. With all our liking for the Spanish people, we must still face the question: Can assistance to Spain be fitted into the larger pattern?

The idea of military assistance to Spain has followed a parallel route. Under present conditions, the inappositeness of Spain as a participant in the North Atlantic undertakings was manifest. Yet Spain has looked longingly upon the program for strengthening the sinews of Spain's neighbors to the end that they might form a viable unit of defense against potential aggressors.

I have found reflected in the Spanish reaction two approaches to the satisfaction of Spain's desires in this regard.

The first is to press upon the United States the hopelessness of establishing a defense line through central Europe. Coupled with this are warnings as to the fickleness and feebleness of the allies we have chosen. Spain is put forth as a geographically and morally more dependable partner.

I have found reflected in the press and in comments from official sources—we should never forget the identity of the press and the official line in Spain—the idea that defense of the North Atlantic area should be premised upon purely military considerations. There are those in this country who respond to this suggestion to divorce strategy from consideration of its political consequences—always an enticing but dangerous formula.

In this latter connection I have given note to two recent interviews granted by the Spanish dictator.

In one, an interview with Mr. Tom Jacob, an Australian journalist, appearing in the Madrid press on November 24, 1949, Generalissimo Franco recognizes frankly the lack of community between Spain and the democratic nations so far as political considerations go. He speaks of democracy as something the Spaniards found not to their liking and rejected "many decades before democracy was practiced in the world in the form which today is considered to be most perfect." He speaks of democracy as something which enchained, ruined, and degraded the Spanish people, who were right in casting it out.

In the other interview, granted to Mr. Constantine Brown, an American journalist, and printed November 27, 1949, Generalissimo Franco speaks suspiciously of politicians as makers of foreign policy and expresses the view that all might be set aright if America were guided by military men. This was echoed in the Madrid newspaper, Informaciones, in the expressed hope that military men might soon be able to "take control of world affairs over from the politicians."

Could we but divorce Spain from the larger pattern of our European policy, and could we but consider defense of the North Atlantic area in a compartment separate from the politics of the area, then the basic issues between us and Spain might indeed be resolved. I believe, however, that at the cost of disappointment to the aspirations of Spain's present regime, we should continue to work within the limits of our present pattern of policy.

By this I do not mean that we must forever follow a negative course toward Spain. I suggest only that we make it clear to ourselves and to Spain as well the course that future cooperation with Spain must take. For the working out of an affirmative policy does not depend merely on what we may do. It depends primarily upon what Spain does.

Three of my colleagues of the Committee on Foreign Affairs went to Spain in the second week of December 1949. They went as friends and admirers of the Spanish people. When called upon to appraise the future of relations between the two countries they spoke candidly of what they regarded as the unrealistic expectations they found in Spain. The senior member of the group, my colleague, Congressman JOSEPH L. PFEIFER, speaking also for Congressmen THOMAS S. GORDON and CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI, spoke at length about the friendly regard of Americans for the Spanish people. Continuing with the outlook for relations, he said:

> I have been asked what is the United States going to do about Spain. I think the order of the question is wrong. I don't mean to be harsh when I say Spain is a secondary problem to the United States. The United States, however, is a primary problem to Spain. The real question is this: What is Spain going to do about the United States? Only the Spaniards themselves can answer that.

There was nothing but candor in this statement—no insult to Spanish pride, no reproach to Spain's regime. Yet the Spanish press answered with a flood of invective, applying such terms as "insolent" and "malice."

I believe there is the key to something important in the reaction of the Spanish press to this inoffensive and well-proportioned statement.

Spain was the first of all the powers to come to national unity and imperial glory. By the start of the sixteenth century Spain had achieved a position within Europe and across the seas unrivaled by any other. Yet this day of power and glory began to fade as suddenly as it had come. By the turn of the next century Spains' imperial decline had set in. That decline continued for 300 years until, a half century ago, Spain yielded up the last of its empire.

Nothing so besets a nation's thinking as the memory of vanished power. This has been true of the Spaniards. Spain achieved its glory alone. For a century Spain enjoyed singular national stature. And then history seemed to pass Spain by.

Spanish thought is still, consciously or unconsciously, dominated by the ideal of national glory singularly achieved and singularly enjoyed. There is always the explicit or implicit belief that the wheel will come full circle again. And Spain has tended to remain aloof from the concert of Europe, to eschew community with other powers, and to withdraw into national pride and ancient memories.

That is the case today with Spain, which prides itself on its separateness and which emphasizes its differences rather than its community with western Europe.

So long as that is the case, so long as Spain insists upon being treated on a separate basis, so long as Spain hangs back from participation in the great joint enterprises, Spain must be a secondary consideration for the United States, which is preoccupied with the considerations of a wider European policy. That is all the meaning I read into my colleague Mr. JOSEPH L. PFEIFER's statement about Spain.

What is Spain going to do about the United States? That is simply another way of asking, What steps does Spain plan to take in order to fit itself into the larger pattern and thus become a part of the primary area of United States concern? When the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOSEPH L. PFEIFER] asked this question, the Spanish press, as exemplified by Arriba, answered that Spain would do precisely nothing.

That may be the present answer. I doubt that it is the final answer.

The day of singular greatness is gone among the western nations. The pattern is no longer that of national and imperial glory. The pattern of greatness now is that of participation in a larger design of cooperation. I, for one, do not believe that pattern in the west will ever be complete until Spain is a part of it. Spain's becoming a part of it is contingent above all on what course Spain itself chooses to follow. The obstacles of the moment must surely pass; but when and how, I do not know.

Meanwhile, we should seek to develop with Spain whatever pattern of cooperation may be feasible without impairing the larger designs of our policy. As a means to that end, we should, as I have suggested, restore as soon as practicable full diplomatic interchange.

In developing such a pattern, we should be vigilant that we keep first things first.

Our primary concern is with bringing about an integration among the free nations of western Europe. We should not jeopardize that design by attempting to force into their fellowship a nation which resolutely renounces such cooperation, and which prides itself on its lack of community rather than its common destiny with the west.

One of the great political tasks within and among the nations of the Western World is that of fitting labor freely and creatively into full participation in the political functions of society. I emphasize the word "freely" to point up the principle that labor must remain free of the impingements of both the Facist and the Communist systems. In response to this principle of our policy, we have today among the free working men of western Europe some of the strongest supporters of the American objectives. Labor, free labor, is moving more and more into a determining position in the political communities of western Europe. We must not sacrfice that support of free labor—a factor so primarily important to us—for purely secondary considerations in a nation where labor is not free.

Fnally, we should reserve for Spain the same terms of assistance that we apply to others. I believe the Spaniards should be advised against unrealistic expectations that we shall have one policy for the rest of western Europe and another for Spain.

The opportunity for assistance on the basis of self-help, mutual assistance, collaboration among free nations, and the preservation of free institutions has never been denied Spain. It is Spain that in the first instance has chosen to walk alone.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. Is the gentleman speaking now for the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. KEE. I am speaking solely my own views and upon my own responsibility.

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. I must confess that I am rather ignorant of the reasons for our not having recognized the Government in Spain. I wonder what the difference is, inasmuch as we have recognized Portugal? What is the difference between that Government as compared with the Government of Spain, which is objectionable?

Mr. KEE. There are a great many differences between the Government of Portugal and the Government of Spain. For one, the Government of Portugal was not placed in power through the operations of other governments or other powers. It is not a government that was forced upon Portugal by outside influences and outside forces. There are various and sundry other differences which it would be time-consuming to enumerate. As a matter of fact, as I have already stated, our Government recognized Spain in 1939.

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. I listened very closely to the gentleman's remarks with reference to the monopolistic practices in Spain. And I was thinking of the monopolistic practices of Soviet Russia when we recognized that country.

Mr. KEE. We have had that experience with quite a number of governments. There are a few other countries in the world that have monopolistic practices to a more or less extent, but there are divisions and degrees in those practices.

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. I may say to the gentleman that I have had considerable difficulty following the reasoning of our State Department as to why we should not recognize the Spanish Government. However, I am very grateful for the gentleman's remarks on the subject.

Mr. KEE. I hope I have resolved some of the gentleman's difficulties.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. What does the gentleman think of the way our State Department and our Committee on Foreign Affairs have been handling the situation in China during the past 3 or 4 years?

Mr. KEE. I think, from the knowledge at first hand, that we have had from time to time, the affairs have been handled just as well and just as intelligently as they possibly could have been handled under all the existing circumstances.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman claims that we have handled them intelligently, yet we have gotten licked at every point.

Mr. KEE. Has the gentleman himself ever been licked?

Mr. RICH. Yes, many times, and I have been licked so many times since I have been a Member of Congress that I just feel that I want to keep on fighting all the time, and I want to fight the principles and policies of the State Department and the Committee on Foreign Affairs in this House all I possibly can. And you just look to me to be a regular tiger for doing that in this session of Congress.

Mr. KEE. I hope that the gentleman's recent experience of being licked will not be his last.

Mr. RICH. Well, I hope so, too.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY] is recognized for 40 minutes.

RURAL AMERICA

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, in asking for this time today I do not want anyone to get the impression that it is the dying gasp of a wounded gladiator. But I would like to review through a few of the problems that confront American agriculture in general, and the oleo industry in particular, and I am glad to talk on a subject that is not controversial in any manner.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Before the gentleman starts, may I ask him one question?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I take it then the gentleman is willing, like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], to be licked in a worthy cause, and that he will be back again if he does get a licking.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I do not think I will get licked individually, because I still believe in the justice of my cause. There might be a temporary let down here for awhile, but I kind of think today, if we had that oleo bill back here in the House, that we would have a whole lot different vote than we had a year ago.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I take it the gentleman is still an optimist then?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I surely am, because I might say that your party and mine pretty nearly stubbed their toes on this issue. In the other body they gave it a sleeping pill and put it to sleep, and maybe the other body will do this again this year. I am sure they would if they knew the facts involved.

The first time I was on the floor of this House 11 years ago I talked on the economic justice for the rural people. At that particular time, in the days when we had more farm foreclosures in Wisconsin than ever before in the history of the Federal land bank, even if that was the seventh year of the more abundant life, many of the blessings of the New Deal had not extended that far at that time.

We had low farm prices. We had 10,000,000 unemployed in the United States. Of course, since that time we have had a war and the country has gone in debt, as you know, around $250,000,000,000. But, all during the said period the thing that has irritated me all the way through is that although there has been some attempt to give economic justice to the rural people, especially during the war period—and part of it was necessary in order to get the necessary things to win the war—there was no generosity on anybody's part that I know in particular, but during this time we have slipped and we have seen that during all this period we are forgetting social justice to the rural people.

I will enumerate a few instances. First of all, we extended the Social Security Act. But, if you will notice we were very careful to leave the rural people out of the act. We had a minimum-wage law. You notice that the rural people were left out of the minimum-wage law. I realize that unorganized labor was indirectly benefited, but the rural people themselves have been pretty well left out of the minimum-wage legislation. Under the circumstances you can get your help for 20 cents an hour for dragging your logs up to a sawmill, but as soon as they start sawing the logs you have to give them 75 cents an hour. That just does not make sense.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. PERKINS. May I ask the gentleman whether he is in favor of including the farmers under the Social Security Act, and also guaranteeing them and their workers a minimum wage?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I surely am. I would not be standing up here today complaining about it if I were not in favor of it. The gentleman's party had better be in favor of it pretty soon, and you had better quit talking about the slave labor that is going along with the Taft-Hartley Act and check up on the Sugar Act. I do not want to hear anyone tell me about the Taft-Hartley being a slave-labor law, because I know where the slave labor is. It is in the Sugar Act, and anyone can find it there if he takes the time to look it up.

Mr. PERKINS. Did the gentleman offer any amendment to the social-security bill or the minimum-wage bill to take care of the situations of which he now complains?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I have been here long enough to know that most of this legislation comes in all cut and dried.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Is it not a fact that the social-security bill came in here under a gag rule, and you could not amend it if you wanted to?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. That is right.

I did not expect to get into an argument so quickly. I knew I would before I got through.

I should like to know why the rural people are left out of social security. They are paying other people social security. I should like to know why the farm people are not included under the minimum wage. I should like to know how we can take one group of our people that labor and give them aid and support in the way of social security and the minimum wage, and give them a pension when they get to be 65 years old that is more than the farmers of this country make during the years when they really work. In other words, there is a relationship there that should be put into operation.

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SUTTON. I agree with the gentleman that the farm workers should be under social security, but is it not a matter of record that the Farm Bureau and the Grange recommended that the farmers and farm labor not be under social security?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I would not want to criticize the Farm Bureau or the Grange or any other farm organization. I have a high regard for them. I do not want to be in the position the administration is, like a school child, where any time something does not happen they lay it on the Farm Bureau or the Republicans instead of putting the responsibility on themselves where it belongs.

Mr. SUTTON. Is it not a fact that that is the testimony in the record?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. The Farm Bureau has the right to make any statement they wish. That has nothing to do with the issue today. I am stating my own position. I am not representing any farm organization. I think that I am right. I may be wrong and I have been in the past, but I think I am right.

This brings up another point about this wage business. Under the Steagall amendment that was put into operation during the war—incidentally Mr. Steagall, whose amendment came from the Committee on Banking and Currency, has done more for American agriculture through that amendment than any piece of legislation this or any other Congress has ever passed. Mr. Henry Steagall at least took into consideration that agriculture included all of agriculture. Under the New Deal they had 25 percent of agriculture covered by special-privilege legislation under the guise of basic commodities, and half of them were not any more basic than horseradish would be. Under Mr. Steagall's set-up all of agriculture had a common consideration.

It grieved me to see President Truman misled into killing the Steagall bill. The minimum wage under the Steagall bill allowed the man who owned the farm to make 50 to 60 cents an hour. That is demonstrated in a 20-year study down here at the BAE. I did not like to see someone mislead President Truman about killing the provisions of the Steagall amendment. When did he do it? On December 31, 1946. How did he do it? With Executive Order No. 2714.

I do not want to put the President in a position of not wanting the farmers of this Nation to have a return for their labor of only 50 or 60 cents an hour, but that is exactly what took place as a result of killing the Steagall bill. It has been made a political football ever since, and the farm people of this country are taking it on the chin as the result of issuing that particular Executive order.

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. SUTTON. I am certainly glad to see that my esteemed colleague on the Committee on Agriculture joins with me, as I join with him, in hoping that the farm laborer and the farmer himself will be able some of these days to come under social security, not as a matter of compulsion, but of his own volition if he wants to.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman. I hope he gets his party and the leader of his party not to kill the legislation when we have it set up on a nonpolitical and nonpartisan basis so that the rural people of this country can have 50 or 60 cents an hour.

Now, this brings us up to the present. I am not going to talk about the year 2000, because I do not believe any one of us is going to be here.

I would like to talk about what is going to happen in 1950. We are going to be faced with this, and there is no use trying to dodge it.

No. 1 is that we are going to take six or seven million acres of land out of cotton. You will hear a lot about cotton from here on out. Of course, we always do. I have listened to this talk all these years, and sometimes I feel as if I have cotton batting in my ears as a result of listening to it. I have tried to be patient, and tried to understand what their problem is. Now, we are going to take some six or seven million acres of land out of cultivation for cotton. I want to yield to any Member of the House to tell me what he is going to do with the people who lived on those six or seven million acres of land in the last few years. What are you going to have them do next year?

Well, they cannot all be census enumerators. But this is not a sectional problem. It is a problem that faces the whole agricultural economy of the country, as well as the economy generally of the country. What is going to happen? What are you going to do with the 11,000,000 acres that are going to be taken out of corn production? What are you going to do with those people? One of my colleagues from Texas told me the other day that they are being told to go into the dairy business. I said you had better not do that, because you fellows are putting people out of the dairy business much faster than you are putting them in.

I said, "You have driven 3,000,000 dairy cows off the farms in the past 5 years." The oleo interests have ruined 10 percent of the American dairy industry right now. No one will dispute that statement. They are waiting for a chance to ruin more. During the last 5 years you have driven a quarter of a million dairy farmers off the farms by giving aid and comfort to the oleo interests.

I do not want to talk sectionalism at all. But what is the use of telling these people that they can go into the dairy business when out of the other side of your mouth you are putting them out of the dairy business.

It should be one way or the other.

Then he said, "Well, the powers that be are telling us to go into the poultry business." That sounds nice. It is easy to say, "Go into the poultry business"; but I happen to remember that the day Mr. Hoover was defeated for President, eggs were 20 cents a dozen. I called up the BAE the other day to make sure. They said that that is exactly what the price of eggs was at that time.

In the Midwest they were 20 cents a dozen in November 1932. After 17 years of the more abundant life eggs were selling at 18 and 19 cents a dozen in the Midwest. The egg fellows are not like the steel corporations who can go out and raise the price of their product $4 a ton. The egg people are sort of sitting around out there waiting for someone from Washington to tell them what they are going to get for eggs.

So surely they cannot go in the egg business.

I do not know what they are going to do with the people that have been producing on that 7,000,000 acres out of cotton. I cannot answer that question. But I am sure that someone in Washington must have the answer. Are they to go on agricultural relief?

I call your attention to the fact that since 1945 the production of milk has decreased 6,000,000,000 pounds. It would take 3,000,000 cows to produce that in the form of butter. That is more than 10 percent of the cows in the United States. That brings me to just exactly what is taking place in another legislative body in the United States.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS. Before the gentleman leaves the question of the price of eggs, does the gentleman mean to say that the price of eggs to the farmer is now 18 cents?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. That is what they were in Iowa in December—18 to 20 cents a dozen.

Mr. JENKINS. I was wondering how general that is. That is a very astonishing thing if it is true, and I am sure that it must be true or the gentleman would not say so.

It is astonishing that in the Midwest eggs are down to 18 cents, whereas you pay 59 to 79 cents a dozen in the stores, or at least in any store that I have ever been in, in the last 2 or 3 months.

No wonder the gentleman is making a speech, if that is the truth about the price of eggs.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. They dropped to as low as 15 cents a dozen in Nebraska and 18 cents in Iowa.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I told my people last year to look out. Hold on to your hats, because I have been here a long time and I know that there is only so much money to go around, and if you are going to keep King Cotton in the style he is used to being kept, it is going to take a lot of money.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The prevailing market price on large eggs—that is, what the farmer gets—grade A eggs, in our country is 27 cents; and on No. 2 eggs, the straight run of eggs that the farmer brings in, is 20 cents a dozen.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. PERKINS. Going back to the statement you made a few moments ago concerning the Sugar Act, perhaps the gentleman has some information that the Members of this House would like to know about. The gentleman referred to slave labor and so forth. I notice in the Sugar Act of 1948, title III, the conditional payments provision, section C–1, states that—

> All persons employed on the farm in the production, cultivation, or harvesting of sugar beets or sugarcane, with respect to which an application for payment is made, shall have been paid in full for all such work, and shall have been paid wages therefor at rates not less than those that may be determined by the Secretary to be fair and reasonable after investigation and due notice and opportunity for public hearing.

In view of that statement embodied in the law, if you know anything about slave labor under this Sugar Act, where farmers are not complying, I think we should know about it.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. If the gentleman had read the RECORD last year, he would have found a letter from the Department of Agriculture which, under the law, gives this power to the Secretary of Agriculture, just as you have read it. He is a member of the President's Cabinet. That is your administration. If he wants to fix the minimum wage at 25 cents an hour in the Virgin Islands, according to that law, or if he wants to fix it at 29 cents an hour in Puerto Rico, according to that law, or if he wants to fix it in Louisiana at 32 to 38 cents an hour, I would think perhaps that is getting pretty close to slave labor. In the sugar-beet areas of Colorado, Nebraska, and California the minimum wage is from 60 to 65 cents an hour, and there are some who pay 75 cents or more an hour. In the Hawaiian Islands they pay from 72 to 78 cents an hour, so sugar does not need to cost the American people any more. All they have to do is to raise the sugar where it should be raised, and pay them 75 cents an hour. It does not make sense to pass a minimum-wage law that is going to apply only to a few. There is no reason in the world why we should not have 75 cents straight across the board.

You ask me why I did not put that through. I have not taken over here yet. I figure that I will later on, and if I do I will put in that 75 cents every day, straight across the board, and if I belonged to the gentleman's party I would not be talking about slave labor until I got it in there, either.

Mr. PERKINS. You gentlemen were in control during the Eightieth Congress, and you did not come forward with any proposals like that.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. If your administration would spend more time in executing the laws that the Congress has passed and less time in telling us what legislation to pass, I am sure the American people would be better off, and so would you.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the gentleman know the prevailing wage that is now being paid in areas where sugarcane is being produced?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. All I know is what the Department's letter says—from 25 cents per hour up. I also have a newspaper clipping, where there was a group of DP's who came over here and they thought this was the land of milk and honey, and they dropped them down in Louisiana in one of those sugar plantations and all at once they evaporated. They could not find them, because they found they were getting $2 and some cents a day. In anybody's language, I presume we could say that was getting close to slave labor. So I say you should get that straightened out.

There is nothing personal on my part. I do not raise any cane and I do not want to raise any cain here. I want you to keep your own doorsteps clear and I will keep mine clear. Just to show the little difference it makes, you will remember that all these years the armed services were not supposed to serve oleo; you have been through all that; you Members know about it. It has been a battle. At this last session they passed it. That is one of their greatest contributions. It resulted in the driving of 15,000 more cows down to the stockyards.

Another item I want to see something done about is this filled-milk business. We do not know how much filled milk is being produced in the United States.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman mind telling the House whether or not the Secretary of Agriculture has failed to authorize the prevailing wage in any instance under this Sugar Act of 1948?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I did not say that our present Secretary had or had not; I said that according to a letter from the Department of Agriculture a secretary fixed the minimum wage at 25 cents in the Virgin Islands, 29 cents in Puerto Rico, 32 to 38 cents in Louisiana, 45 cents in Florida, 60 to 65 cents in Colorado, Nebraska, and California. I want to be fair about that; there were prerequisites that went along with that. He did not fix the price in the Hawaiian Islands, for there it was fixed by the people themselves at from 72 to 78 cents an hour.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. If the mandatory support price on eggs expired on December 31 why was it that eggs fell to such a low price as has been mentioned here, 15, 18, and 20 cents a dozen early in December?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. The only reason they did is because the law was not followed; that is all.

Mr. CURTIS. By whom?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. By whoever had the executive power of the Government to enforce the law. As I say, we have not had enough enforcement of the law in connection with this whole support program. The law should be followed. If the law is that they should be paid 35 cents they should get 35 cents. But they did not get 35 cents. I do not want to be placed in the uncomfortable situation of telling my people that under the law they will get one price and then have those in charge of administering the law allow a different price to be paid.

Mr. CURTIS. Up until the law expired on the last day of December was any discretionary power vested in the Secretary of Agriculture as to whether or not he could withdraw that support?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. No; the Secretary had the power to do it up until January 1.

Mr. CURTIS. Did he have power to refrain from doing it?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I do not know what you are going to do to him if he did not do it.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. That support price was ordered last August, but if the buyers do not want to buy they do not pay the support price.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. The farmers have to sell their eggs whether or not they are paid 35 cents a dozen for them or 20.

Mr. GROSS. The farmer had to sell them either to the drying plant or to someone buying for the drying plant.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. That may be; I cannot settle that.

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. SUTTON. The gentlemen from the Committee on Agriculture will remember——

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that the gentleman on the other side of the House has not addressed the Chair.

Mr. SUTTON. The gentleman from Michigan failed to hear me.

The gentleman realizes——

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. No. A point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman should address the Chair.

Mr. SUTTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield to me.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. SUTTON. The gentleman realizes that in the bill we passed last year we were trying to take care of the farmer in a number of basic products; we were trying to help him.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes; you surely are going to help him, but I do not want to get off on the Anderson or Aiken or the Brannan plan now; today I am speaking for the two and a half million dairy farmers in the country. I want to confine myself to that.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield while we are on the egg subject?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I do not want to get into the egg business. I am in the oleo business.

Mr. JENSEN. I am in the hog business and our hog people are in the same predicament as the egg people and the poultry people. Why? Because in the last agricultural bill you took eggs, poultry, and hogs from under the support price and down they go. Up to January 1 they did not support the price of hogs, and I say the hog business in the State of Iowa is really a big business. We are suffering.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, now what is the real issue today? The real issue today is whether or not you are going to further destroy the livestock industry of this country. There is no use trying to work both sides of the street. I may be on the wrong side of the street, but I am only on one side anyway. Here is the story, and I wish you would get this. I want to make a statement and I shall yield to anybody to dispute it.

Surely you can sell oleo cheaper than dairy products, but I would like to have someone figure out how many cents a pound oleo is being subsidized? I will yield to anyone to tell you any agricultural product or any food product that is subsidized anywhere near as much as oleomargarine is at this very hour.

It is rather interesting to me to read magazines like Life magazine which has those beautiful pictures in there of oleo. Then you read the editorials. I do not know whether there is any relationship between the editorials and the advertisements or not. But they are always against subsidies. Have you ever noticed that? Here they are, the same ones who are against subsidies, against the farmers having a subsidy, and I could quote a lot of other papers, too, if I wanted to, are opposing these subsidies, yet they are out advocating oleo. Oleo has more of a subsidy per pound than any other food product at this time or any other time. If anyone wishes to correct that statement, I will be glad to have them do so.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot tell you how much oleo is subsidized. You would have to do a lot of research work to determine it. We do know that we produce, as far as our needs in the United States are concerned, something over a billion, 2 billion or 3 or 4 billion pounds of cottonseed oil. The cottonsed oil is rapidly replacing soybean oil in oleo. There is twice as much cotton-seed oil being used as soybean oil in oleo.

If you figure up all of the subsidies there are to cotton, you will find that cotton has more subsidies than the British have traditions. You would have to get the Brookings Institution to look up the figures. Yet I read every day in the papers how much the farmers are getting. I have here one corporation that on cotton received over a million-dollar subsidy 2 years ago. They sent this to me in confidence and I never betray a confidence, but that corporation received a little more than a million dollars. That is just one corporation. Whether oleo is being subsidized at 10 cents or 50 cents a pound, I cannot say. Of course, you cannot charge it all against the oil. You have to place some of the subsidies on the cotton itself.

I checked up to the past July and I found that we had given away $600,000,000 worth of cotton. I am not saying that the Commodity Credit Corporation lost that much but I do say that the American taxpayer has lost that amount. I do not want to say whether it is a half-billion dollars a year or not. Now we have a cotton bill on which we are going to have a hearing tomorrow. Mr. Ralph S. Trigg, head of the Commodity Credit Corporation, said that if we pass it we will have to provide funds for 3,000,000 more bales of cotton. Yet we cannot use what we already have. We give it away. Of course, it has been cut in two, and I understand that will mean several millions of dollars. It will be kind of an agricultural WPA, because we are going to have them raise a whole lot of cotton that we do not need. In fact, we do not know what we are going to do with what we have now. They will make it into oleo, I guess.

Let us get back once more to the oleo business.

I do not want this debate to go by without realizing what the issue is. Butter is only a part of the issue. The issue is the infiltration of vegetable oils into the whole dairy industry.

In the other body, in discussing this issue, I notice they are saying, well, Wisconsin does not produce so much butter, which is true, and therefore we should not be interested in it. The point is that the dairy people of Wisconsin know what this issue is. A good example has been filled milk, and that controversy has been going on for 25 years. Filled milk is made by taking out the butterfat. They used to put in coconut oil and call it coconut cow milk. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] was here when they passed the bill 25 years ago that prevented them shipping it interstate. But, nobody in the Department knows how much they are making, and if they do not follow the law any more than the oleo they give to the armed forces, well, that is just too bad. Incidentally, all the boys I had in my office since I had Rosy there claim that they get the oleo and the officers get the butter. But, I cannot prove that either. But, this filled milk is just another one of the substitutes. They sell it for about 2 cents a can less than evaporated milk. Why, of all of the faked endorsements and advertisements. They tell you or they even try to make you believe that you can rub it on your head and grow hair and tell you what this doctor and that doctor said. Did you ever hear of a doctor telling you to feed that to your babies? There are millions of babies raised on evaporated milk, but did you ever hear of them giving cottonseed-oil milk to the children? Oh, no. Yet they say that these imitations are just as good as the real thing. Now, the whole dairy industry today is faced with that situation. If it is going to be good public policy to go ahead and follow that line, all well and good.

I listened with interest the other day to our President, your President and my President, and he was talking about the general welfare. I just wondered when he was talking whether it was the kind of general welfare for some international oil monopoly, such as Mr. Luckman, of Lever Bros., heads. Is he particularly interested in the general welfare of that outfit that is really the prime mover of this whole thing? I did not like to think that he was. I wondered if his interest in the general welfare was in the 24 or 25 oleo manufacturers that reaped such enormous profits by taking away the dairy markets during the war and afterward. They had Mr. Luckman help out on that, as you remember. He was down here. The Agricultural Department could not handle this situation, but Mr. Luckman, as I remember it, was the chief chicken shooter. He was not going to let them feed the chickens or eat the eggs, either. What the President really meant, I think, in the bottom of his heart, is that he was thinking about the general welfare of 2,500,000 dairy farmers in this country, and that his thoughts were not just on those 25 or 26 oleo manufacturers, or the Lever Bros.' international vegetable oil cartel, and that he was thinking about the general welfare of all the people.

Then we have Mr. Ewing and all the rest of them tell us about the health of the Nation. We hear it on all occasions. I saw a picture of some girls the other day showing how they would look in the year 2000. I then thought they would not want to pass the oleo bill, because they will be midgets and dwarfs by that time. We are stupid to appropriate money to our universities and agricultural colleges and to spend money in connection with agricultural chemistry if milk is not the greatest food ever known to man. There is not a doubt about it at all. I imagine Mr. Ewing, interested in health legislation, surely is not going to tell us that we should reduce the consumption of dairy products. Milk and its products are protective foods for the grown-ups as well as for the children. Mr. Ewing surely cannot be for more and more oleo and still insist he is for the health of the Nation.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman made reference to Mr. Luckman. I know he is one of the great financiers of this international corporation, Lever Brothers. I understand that Mr. Luckman is also chairman of the Jackson Day dinners down here. They expect 4,000 people to come there and pay $100 a plate for their food. I am reliably informed that Mr. Luckman intends to serve oleomargarine instead of butter at the Jackson Day dinner. That oleomargarine is made by his company, as the gentleman knows. Lever Bros. is one of the large producers of oleomargarine. Has the gentleman any opinion on that, or has he heard that Mr. Luckman may serve Jelke's, or Lever Brothers' oleomargarine at that $100-a-plate Jackson Day dinner, as a special treat to those who contribute the $100?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Luckman has not taken that matter up with me, but if he had, I would have asked him if it is not true that they are just taking these southerners, the cotton boys, along for a little ride.

There is one thing I will say for the Washington News editorials. I hand it to that paper as far as their news articles are concerned. They have always been against the dairy side in their editorials, but their news articles have always been fair on this subject. I noted a reference in that paper about imports of vegetable oils.

They are building a big oleo plant out in California. Coconut oil is nearer butterfat than any other vegetable oil. There is no argument about that. I just wondered what our good cottonseed friends are going to say when we roll in the coconut oil from the Philippines or wherever they get it from. If they start rolling that in they can make oleo cheaper than they can make it out of domestic oils. At the same time, we are not going to be appropriating as much money to the cottonseed people and to the soybean people as we have been. The soybeans are just a war baby, anyway. They have had plenty of subsidy, probably just as much as the cottonseed oil. I did not have time to get at all the figures, and I do not know whether it is 10 cents or 50 cents a pound on the oil that would have to be charged up against that product.

I believe that the Congressmen from the five States of North Carolina, Tennessee, Kentucky, Mississippi, and Alabama in 5 years from today will be in the camp of the people that really believe in the dairy industry, because they can see the handwriting on the wall.. As they develop industrially they create a local demand for dairy products. They know that a few big western cotton people would gladly put them out of business. If we did not produce any more cotton than we needed in the United States, we would have to cut the acreage in two this year to say nothing about the big cut you hear about on the floor every day and will hear more about as time goes on.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. My colleague from Minnesota spoke about the $100-a-plate Jackson Day dinner they are going to have down here at the Armory. I wonder whether the Republicans, when we have our Lincoln Day dinner at a dollar a plate at Uline's Arena, are going to have butter. I think we are. I think if we can have butter at a dollar a plate, the Democrats ought to have 100 butters for $100.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I do not want to get into the political angle of this thing. This is a serious business. I want to point out to you another example of the infiltration of these vegetable oils. Take the oleo ice cream that is being made now. That is just one more phase of this. That will eliminate just that many more cows. We will not need 25,000,000 dairy cows in this country if this keeps up. Three million dairy cows have been sent to the slaughterhouse already. That is more than 10 percent of the dairy cows. Remember much of this reduction took place in a very short period of time.

So, just let that Poage-Fulbright bill go through. Then, consider No. 4. Here is another situation. Some of the Members have been on congressional committees that have gone to Tokyo. I have talked with some of the Members who were out there and drank the oleo bottled milk. It was amusing to me when we had the bill up here to hear some people say it is all right to eat oleo as long as you drink plenty of milk. You did not know you were going to get in the same trap. Some of the Members voted that way. I have had a good deal of trouble from my colleagues on my side.

In Washington today there are fellows who are yelling about subsidy, subsidy, subsidy, and yet they support the largest agricultural subsidy that any commodity gets. It is the oleo subsidy. It is a serious business when you stop to think of it. What happened during the last fiscal year? We imported over half a million head of cattle for their beef. Yes, the dairy industry furnishes over 40 percent of the beef and veal of the Nation. We should save the dairy industry while we still can do so. We should cooperate with the FAO and establish a world food organization. We should do our own thinking and not be misled by any highly financed propaganda that complains about farm subsidies and then advocates oleo which is the most highly subsidized article of food on the markets of our country.

MEETING OF COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE ON COTTON-ACREAGE BILL

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WHITE of California). The Chair wishes to announce, at the request of the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY], chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, that on Wednesday, January 11, at 10 a. m., in room 1310, New House Office Building, there will be a meeting of the Subcommittee on Cotton of the Committee on Agriculture, for the purpose of considering House Joint Resolution 384, designed to correct alleged inequities in the cotton-acreage bill recently passed. All Members of the House are invited to participate.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TALLE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter addressed to him, and also a newspaper editorial.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. PATMAN asked and was given permission to address the House on Thursday next for 20 minutes, after disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk and at the conclusion of any special orders heretofore entered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] for 15 minutes under special order.

AMERICAN PROSPERITY

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I believe that a nation's greatness can be measured by the happiness and prosperity of the people who do the work to produce the nation's wealth. Using this standard our Nation today is a truly great one because the people who work on the farm and in the factory are happier and more prosperous than at any other time in our Nation's history. More people own their homes and farms than ever before. More people work for good wages than ever before. More people enjoy modern conveniences, benefits and comforts, both rural and urban, than ever before in our history.

GREATEST NATION ON EARTH

Although our country started out on a shoestring 160 years ago with only 5 percent of the land surface of the earth, and now with only 7 percent of the earth's population, we use more than one-half of the world's telephones; we own one-third of all railroad mileage of the world, and 80 percent of all the world's registered automobiles and trucks. We use one-half of the world's coffee, tin, and rubber, 20 percent of its sugar, and 75 percent of its silk.

HOW 50,000,000 AMERICAN FAMILIES ARE LIVING

We are told by our critics that the Democratic Party has thrown our country into bankruptcy. A recent Federal survey finds that 51 percent of the 50,000,000 American families own at least one automobile; one out of 17 families own two or more, and 77 percent of these 50,000,000 American families own life-insurance policies with premiums costing more than $100 a year. Seventy-one percent of these 50,000,000 American families have bank accounts or Government savings bonds and 45 percent of these 50,000,000 American families own a home or a farm.

It is my belief that depressions are man made and that they can be avoided, and if we were to study the depressions of the past individually, I believe we would find that they could have been avoided if honest, unselfish efforts had been made to avoid them.

In the congressional district in northeast Texas that I have the honor to represent 90 percent of the farm homes have electricity, which is one of the greatest blessings of all mankind. When we came into power in 1933 less than 1 percent of the farms had electricity. The farmers have a floor under their prices, which is in effect a guaranteed minimum price. This is justified because the Nation's prosperity is dependent upon the prosperity of agriculture and, besides, the first general law that was ever passed by an American Congress was a protective tariff act to subsidize industry in the United States, which principle has been in effect ever since.

ACT OF FIRST CONGRESS

I have here a copy of the proceedings of the acts of the First Congress of the United States passed at the first session which was begun and held in the city of New York on Wednesday, March 4, 1789, and continued to September 29, 1789; George Washington, President, John Adams, Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate; Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The first act was one to regulate the time and manner of administrating certain oaths, which is strictly procedural. The second act, and the first general act passed by that American Congress, was an act for levying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, including such things as brown sugar 1 cent per pound, loaf sugars 3 cents per pound, coffee 2½ cents per pound, cheese 4 cents a pound, soap 2 cents a pound, boots 50 cents a pair, snuff 10 cents a pound, salt 6 cents per bushel, wool and cotton cards 50 cents per dozen.

I am just skipping along, covering only a small part of them—and on every coach, chariot, or other four-wheel carriage, 15 percent, like our transportation tax today. There are over a hundred commodities in all covered in this act.

The point I want to make is that the first general law passed by an American Congress was a protective tariff act, a floor under industrial prices that has been in effect ever since for industry and business.

It has been claimed it was necessary to help our country. At the same time I insist that it is necessary that agriculture be protected to help our country. I believe that the laws that we have passed granting support prices for the farmers were absolutely necessary to have a prosperous country. Our country cannot be prosperous without a prosperous agriculture. The protective tariff, which has been in effect all the time, insofar as the farmers were concerned, resulted in discriminating against agriculture, because a farmer was forced to sell in a competitive market and buy in a protected market. Support prices, after over 150 years' delay, partly correct this discrimination against the farmers. Our soil is receiving the attention of the Federal Government, and properly so. It is believed if we do not do something about preventing erosion and improving our soil, one of these days we will wake up to find that we do not have enough soil to produce the food and the fiber necessary to sustain our greatly expanded population.

It would surprise you to know how many of the farmers in the district I have the honor to represent also enjoy hot and cold running water and all modern facilities, nicely painted and papered homes, rural telephones, all-weather roads, school-bus service, and rural free delivery in their farm homes today. Many of them have all the mechanical comforts and conveniences of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York City.

I think there is reason for us to believe that although the trend during the first half of the twentieth century was toward the cities, people going from the country to the city, the trend during the next 50 years will be from the cities to the country, because today the people on the farms can enjoy the same benefits, comforts, conveniences, and advantages that the people in the cities enjoy.

I think if we will keep on supporting the farmers' prices just as we have protected industry and business for 161 years we will not only have a prosperous agriculture but we will have a prosperous country. We cannot have a prosperous country without a prosperous agriculture.

The farmers who have the benefit of support prices are enabled thereby to make for themselves, if they work, an honorable living, a good living. With support prices, with soil conservation practices to protect their soil from erosion and to improve it, and then with the benefits of electricity, with all the appliances that go with electricity, like radio and television, and then with the benefit of gas, hot and cold running water, and an all-weather road, with school bus service and rural free delivery, a farm family can live just as well today or a little bit better than any family can live in all the world. That is the reason they are going to be attracted to the farms, I believe, during the last half of the twentieth century.

The object of imposing upon you for these few minutes is to express the hope that nothing will be done that will be injurious to our fine farm program.

BRANNAN PLAN

Personally I happen to believe in the Brannan plan. I favor the Brannan plan. The Brannan plan is exactly the same kind of plan for agriculture as the protective tariff was for industry 160 years ago, and for business. Since we have had a Brannan plan for industry and business for 160 years, come next July Fourth, let us start now and have a Brannan plan for agriculture. Let us all prosper together.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. LODGE (at the request of Mr. CURTIS) was given permission to address the House for 30 minutes on Thursday, January 12, after the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and the conclusion of special orders heretofore granted.

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] is recognized for 15 minutes.

(Mr. RICH asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include parts of several letters and other matter.)

FINANCIAL CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, it was in a class in civil government. The teacher was asking what were the duties of the several officers in Congress. "Now, what is the duty of the Chaplain?" she asked of a lad of 12. "The Chaplain," said he, "stands up in front of the Congress, looks them over, and then prays for the country."

The teacher gave him 100 percent on that answer.

Mr. Speaker, we have just heard the budget message of the President of the United States, which was submitted to the Congress this afternoon in which the President states that he is asking the Congress for $42,400,000,000, and admits that he will receive in receipts, I presume on the basis of an estimate of the Treasury Department, the sum of only $37,300,000,000.

That will leave us $5,100,000,000 in the red. The President of the United States, that is, the present incumbent of that office, ever since he has been in office, has submitted a budget which has placed us in the red, and for 17 years, except for 2 years during the Eightieth Congress, we have been in the red. In other words, in 1933, when this administration came into power we were $20,000,000,000 in the red. Today we are $257,000,000,000 in the red. We have gone in the red $237,000,000,000, notwithstanding that the Eightieth Congress had a credit of about $754,000,000 one year and over $8,000,000,000 the second year.

So you can see that with the Chief Executive of the United States recommending to the Congress budgets that are continuously in the red, a great calamity awaits the American people. To me it is nothing more than downright stealing—stealing money that really belongs to our children and our children's children, because they are going to be compelled to pay the bill that this administration is now running up, expecting somebody in future years to pay it or else repudiate it.

It calls to my mind the time when one of the citizens in my district, shortly after the First World War, asked me to invest in German marks. He said, "Bob, you can buy German marks today at 2½ cents, and if you hold them for 8 or 10 years they will probably go back to 20 or 25 cents and you can make some money."

Well, I was foolish, and I said, "All right, I will buy some of them." Here is one of them. You look through it and you can see old Kaiser Wilhelm's picture, a 100-mark note. I paid $2.50 for it. In about 10 or 15 years after that you could buy two bushel of them for 2½ cents. They were not worth the paper they were written on.

Now, what is happening to this country? We are heading in the same direction that Germany did when they had a mark that they thought was worth 24 cents in our money. It went down to nothing. Today, with the continual draining of the resources of the American people and deficit spending, we are going in the same direction that old Germany did when they repudiated their debt. We should have President Truman's picture on our paper money today. He is leading us the same way.

Let me say that in 1933, when we had another President who told the people of this country to buy American bonds, that they were the most solid investment we could possibly make, and then when he died with an estate of over a million dollars he left the grand sum of less than $1,000 in Government bonds. It seems to me he did not practice what he preached.

The President of the United States says, "Buy bonds. Buy America." I am saying to you we are selling America short. If we continue this process that we are doing now, we are going to reap the greatest whirlwind of dissatisfaction, discord, and bankruptcy that any country every knew. I say to you that by this kind of financing in this country we are simply stealing from our children and our children's children. We are not building up an economy that is sound. We are building an economy on false promises, something that will wreck us as surely as the sun shines. We ought to change our tactics. Do it quick. At least be honest.

I was interested in listening to the address of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Mr. CANNON a few minutes ago. He figures that the amount of money the President asked for for 1951 is not $42,400,000,000, as the President said, but the sum of $45,000,000,000. He increased it almost $2,600,000,000 over what the President suggested. But, he said, "we are going to cut down those expenses." I have heard him say that time and time again during the last 7 or 8 years, but I have not seen it happen. I hope we have enough men in this House with sufficient backbone and stamina to cut down these expenses. It is not a question today of increasing taxes. Today it is a question of cutting down expenses. That is the most important thing and the thing that we should do. Why does not the President of the United States take the lead?

I have been a Member of this House for the last 17 years, and I have heard them talk about needing more taxes to get along in this country. I was here when the national debt was $20,000,000,000. I saw this spending spree going on. I voted for fourteen tax bills that the Democrats foisted upon the American people. I did it because I wanted a sound Government. I did not do it because I wanted to get taxes out of the American people, but I said, "We want economy in the operation of the Government. We want the things back in our home State that we need to do, rather than to be concentrating all our efforts right here in the city of Washington."

It is wrong to do that. In those years of the taxes paid by the people of this country 75 percent went for local government, and 25 percent went for the Federal Government. Today, however, 75 percent goes to the National Government in Washington and 25 percent to the local governments back home. This shows the trend of this enormous spending spree that we are in, which eventually will lead to disaster. The New Deal, the Fair Deal, and, I might say, a raw deal for our children.

Let me read excerpts from two or three letters which came to me this morning. I get them by the hundred, not only from my own district but from every district in the country. These, however, happen to come from my own district.

Here is the first one:

I note that you were able to sit through the joint session and listen to the President's dream. It is hard for me to understand how any man can believe that such plans as he has in mind can be accomplished. It is quite apparent to me that he has but one thing in mind and that is that he will continue to be President the rest of his life. He seems to have no consideration for the future generation.

Here is another:

No doubt you have had the enclosed article called to your attention quite a few times in the last couple of weeks, but I believe it cannot be expressed too strongly that governmental spending is losing all sense of sound economic practices that are taught in high schools and colleges all over the country. It is inconceivable that President Truman's administration could spend $191,000,000,000 in 4 years, while 32 preceding Presidents and 156 years of time could not spend $179,000,000,000. These figures do not include the extraordinary expenditures of the war years from 1941 to 1945.

Before the United States should try to put foreign economy on a going basis it seems quite evident to me that the United States should put its own financial house in order.

I understand that you are in favor of balancing the budget of the Nation, and if so, I wish you many successes in the coming year.

Here is a third one:

As a citizen of the United States, a taxpayer, I am concerned about the terrible amount of money that is being spent by our Government. And I ask that you bring the matter before Congress and do your best to curb the waste, the unwise spending or whatever it is that is putting our country in this alarming condition.

I wish I could say to these people that I felt we would achieve this economy, but I am afraid, unless this administration stops spending, I cannot.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RICH. For a question? Yes; I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. Is it not a fact that 76 cents out of every dollar in our budget is to pay for past wars and provide for security?

Mr. RICH. Even if that be so, the President ought to have enough sense when he sends a budget down here that he himself estimates at $42,400,000,000, but which the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House says will be forty-five billion, to cut $5,000,000,000 from it and have the budget in balance. While we are enjoying times of prosperity, while we are passing through times of high earning power in this country, we ought to have enough common sense in our systems and in our souls to try to keep from stealing the money that belongs to future generations.

Furthermore, you will remember that in the President's budget message today he said we were going to collect $2,000,000,000 that was supposed to be for social security. That is a trust fund that should have been set aside for the purpose of paying social security benefits to the aged and the unemployed who pay money in for that purpose. Yet the President calls that income to the Government and deducts that from the amount of his spending. In other words, if we pay for the thing as we should, we would still be $2,000,000,000 farther from the figures the President submitted. You gentleman know the law. If any banker in this country handles a trust fund and spends that money for his own purpose, it would not be 48 hours before the law would take hold of him and he would be tried expeditiously and put behind the bars for spending money that was given him in trust. I say that any man, whether he be a Member of Congress or not—I do not care—who spends a trust fund ought to be put behind the bars.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman has been criticizing President Truman's budget.

Mr. RICH. Yes. I do have a right to.

Mr. PATMAN. Is it not a fact that all of our troubles stem from the fact that the gentleman helped to pass over the President's veto a tax-reduction bill in 1947. If that had not been done we would have a balanced budget.

Mr. RICH. That is bosh. You know, you had a tax of 95 percent on industry which we cut down to 38 percent. Every industry in this country is now paying 38 percent on its income. If you put a tax of 95 percent on you would close every industry. Throw people out of jobs, then what? That is what you are trying to do. You Members on that side of the House are trying to lick industry and put the Government in all kinds of business. You are trying to socialize America. You are not only trying to socialize it, and if you are successful in accomplishing that, then you will have wrecked the country. That is what they did in Great Britain. We do not want that here. You are trying to establish a socialized government here and they are trying to maintain one in Great Britain. You voted to keep socialism alive in Britain by ECA appropriations. I opposed it, and will do it again.

Mr. Speaker, we want a different attitude on the part of the Members of Congress here and I hope that it will result in economy. I hope that you and I and every Member of Congress will work to that end just as hard as we know how.

Mr. Speaker, as a part of my remarks I include the following news bulletins:

[From Washington (D. C.) News Bulletin of January 4, 1950]

THE DRIFT TOWARD ECONOMIC INTERNATIONALISM

"Anyone who claims he can increase a nation's purchasing power by redistributing wealth, juggling the price, manipulating the currency, or by using any other means than labor intelligently applied in production, is either a faker or a fool."

—John Rustgard.

President Truman's state of the Union message delivered to the Congress today was in substance a stirring appeal for public support of his brave new world policies outlined for the first time last year. In substance the President asks that we as a people embark upon a world-wide share-the-wealth program conceived in all probability by those followers of the cult of idealism, who previously have come forward with grandiose ideas for some form of a world super government under which the sovereignty of the Republic of the United States would be submerged.

The President urges wholehearted support of the United Nations, which means that our taxpayers will continue to foot one-third of the administrative costs besides making substantial contributions to special projects set up under the United Nations, such as the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization for which an appropriation of $3,703,385 was made in fiscal 1948.

Our adventures into the fields of international sociology and economics have been very costly in the past, and every sincere patriot should at this time consider the warning issued by Senator Warren G. Harding in 1921, that:

"It is better to be the free and disinterested agents of international justice and advancing civilization, with the covenant of conscience, than be shackled by a written compact which surrenders our freedom of action and gives to a military alliance, the right to proclaim America's duty to the world."

The President apparently counts on heavy Republican support for his international policies since he has placed peace as the prime objective of the Nation.

The professional do-gooders, the one-worlders, and the yes "me too" segment of the Republican Party have already reduced it to almost total impotency. If just a few more converts to the administration's program can be made, the GOP is as good as dead. This of course is one man's opinion—but shared by many who are sick and tired of straddling evidenced in the last three presidential campaigns.

JEFFERSON'S VIEWS

In a letter to J. B. Colvin, dated September 20, 1810, Thomas Jefferson wrote:

"A strict observance of the written law is doubtless one of the highest duties of a good citizen, but it is not the highest.

"The laws of necessity, of self-preservation, of saving our country when in danger are of higher obligation. To lose our country by a scrupulous adherence to written law would be to lose the law itself, with life, liberty, and property, and all of those who are enjoying them with us; thus absolutely sacrificing the end to the means."

Despite the assurance given to Congress and the people that our economy is sound, the facts indicate that the net income of the people of the United States, in terms of the current purchasing power of the dollar is still approximately 25 percent below what it was in 1929. Our economy is burdened with a public and private debt that just about approaches our total national assets. The wealth of the United States has been multiplied since 1900, but so has our liabilities as shown by the table following:

Wealth of the United States	$88,517,307,000.00	$498,500,000,000.00
Public debt	1,263,416,913.00	257,000,000,000.00
Per capita public debt	16.56	[1] 1,696.49

PAUL O. PETERS.

Mr. Speaker, my slogan: "Be thrifty in 1950."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

TRUMAN'S ROSY PICTURE DOES NOT KEEP US WARM

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in his message to Congress, President Truman painted a beautiful word picture. He told us how great and prosperous was our Nation; how fortunate our people—fortunate not only because we had so much of everything we wanted; lucky not only because we lived while he was President, but because in the not too distant future, as a nation we would be still more prosperous and powerful, and that the average family income would be around $12,000 per year.

Because he did not go so far as to tell us that he would keep us out of world war III or give us any idea of what the $12,000 per year would buy, some reactionary, horse-and-buggy Republicans did not seem over-happy. But then, because they are always looking down their noses, the President was not greatly disturbed.

So, with the President in the saddle and his party in control of the public purse, the Nation still able to borrow money by selling bonds, we may be well on our way toward another boom without the "bust." Although again, selfish interests, according to the President, seem determined to interfere with his program, designed to give all vote-strong groups what they ask, and predict a "bust."

But the facts of life, as encountered by the folks in the "sticks," if what we hear and read is accurate, seem to smear just a little the President's rosy picture of universal plenty for all without effort by anyone.

It might be said that neither Harry S. Truman nor John L. Lewis is politically ambitious, stubborn, desirous of having his own way. It might be said that each and both working together have only the public's good, comfort, and well-being in mind.

True, one cannot say that they are, in the strictest sense of the word, either buddies or pals, or that they are working toward the same end, but their joint acts are producing a common result.

It may be assumed that each is honest, sincere, kindly, charitable, and abhors misery and suffering. Such an assumption might be based upon the well-known fact that John L. Lewis for years has been working for the betterment of the United Mine Workers.

The mine workers are engaged in a hazardous occupation. Their work is dirty and dangerous and, for all too long, their pay inadequate. Beyond question, Lewis has aided in raising their wages, in shortening their hours, lessening their daily tasks.

Some now suggest that the increase in wages has to some degree followed the national pattern and that, for an overall period, the miners may not have gained quite so much in increased wages as the figures seem to indicate.

But let us assume, for there are facts to support the assumption, that Mr. Lewis has really had, not his own financial gain principally in mind, but the good of the working mine workers, this although Mr. Lewis would be the first to concede that he has personally profited enormously while serving the miners.

Because President Truman says he is a vigorous advocate of equal rights for all; of the expenditure of Federal money for low- and medium-price housing; of the collection of money from all for the payment of social-security benefits to some, for Federal aid to education—in fact, for all plans which include the collection of additional taxes from everyone and the distribution of billions to the vote-producing groups and the sending of other billions to foreign countries, either to fight communism or make secure British trade, it may be assumed that he, too, like Lewis, is desirous of preventing hardship and suffering.

Are their acts consistent with their pronouncements?

Desirous as these two gentlemen, President Truman and John L. Lewis, may be of preventing hardship and suffering, unemployment and the curtailment of business, their joint acts or failure to act are curtailing, if not destroying, many a small business, bringing about unemployment, and are the direct cause of unnecessary suffering.

If the results which their joint acts have caused were deliberately and knowingly brought about by an individual or group of individuals or by a soulless corporation, it might, and it undoubtedly would, be charged that such an individual, group, or corporation was cruel, heartless, lawless, and, for selfish ends, causing unnecessary suffering, sickness, and perhaps death, to many of the people of our country.

Certainly, keeping in mind the announced humanitarian purposes of the President and of Mr. Lewis, one should not charge that they or either, for selfish or political reasons, was knowingly doing this despicable thing.

So let us assume that neither President Truman nor Mr. Lewis is aware of the situation which they have created.

In extenuation of their lack of knowledge, it should be recalled that each has recently spent considerable time, relaxed and enjoyed himself, under the sunny skies, in the soothing waters of the Gulf, on the sightseeing beaches of the South.

There, entranced by the beauty and beauties of the surroundings, one might be able to forget some of the facts of life as they exist north of the Mason and Dixon's line and west of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, where ice and snow cause daily hardships.

Both the President and Mr. Lewis are tops in their chosen field. In any political battle with any United States opponent—we eliminate Churchill and Stalin from the contest—these two gentlemen would be top-heavy favorites.

Unfortunately, however, they are at the moment engaged, and will continue to be engaged, in a contest where the rules they enunciate do not prevail. With Jack Frost and Old Man Winter as their opponents, President Truman and John L. Lewis, astute and experienced as they may be, with a long, long string of wins, without defeats, are up against contestants who know the fundamentals of the game, who play under and use Nature's, not politicians', rules.

Jack Frost, Old Man Winter, may this year have delayed a little in coming on the field, but, in some sections of the country at least, they have arrived. Today, individuals in more than one-half of the area of our country have had a call from Jack Frost, and Old Man Winter is settling down for a long and steady stay.

John L. Lewis and President Harry S. Truman, in the order named, are responsible for the fact that, with the dropping of the thermometer, which both knew was inevitable, there is throughout our land a shortage of coal.

Because of the acts and inactivity of Mr. Truman and Mr. Lewis, in the homes in the North, the housewives, the mothers, lack the fuel to keep themselves or their children warm. They lack the coal to cook the food which the family needs.

Because of the acts and inactivity of Mr. Truman and Mr. Lewis, even in some of the housing provided by a paternalistic government, there is or shortly will be a heat shortage. A freezing temperature is no comforter in a heatless home.

Because of the acts and inactivity of Mr. Truman and Mr. Lewis, school lunches, provided by State and Federal Governments, may be eaten cold or frozen, that is, even though there is sufficient coal to keep the schoolhouses warm. It may be necessary, it undoubtedly will be, unless some action is promptly taken, to close the public schools.

Because of the acts of Mr. Lewis and the inactivity of Mr. Truman, hospitals will find themselves short of fuel.

Because of the acts of Mr. Lewis and the inactivity of Mr. Truman, public utilities may find it necessary to curtail the supply of water, of electricity.

Because of the acts of Mr. Lewis and the inactivity of Mr. Truman, already public transportation on the railways is being curtailed.

In short and to put it all in one paragraph, notwithstanding the so-called humanitarian pronouncements of Mr. Truman and of Mr. Lewis, Mr. Truman's rosy promises as to the future, today individuals in the North are actually suffering because of the policies now pursued by Mr. Truman and by Mr. Lewis.

And, sad as it may be, the people's representatives in Congress assembled lack either the inclination, the ability or the courage to apply a remedy—that is, to either force Mr. Lewis' United Mine Workers to dig coal or to get out of the way so that someone who is willing to work can and will dig it.

TAX REDUCTION

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, in regard to the tax reduction bill of the Eightieth Congress, may I say that was the second tax reduction bill passed since the end of the war. The first one included an across-the-board tax reduction for individuals as well as a tax reduction for corporations voted by a Democratic Congress, it was passed at a time when we were operating at a deficit.

So far as the tax-reduction bill of the Eightieth Congress is concerned 71 percent of its benefits went to the people making less than $5,000 per year. It cost over $2,000,000,000 in revenue to raise the personal exemptions from $500 to $600. It was a good tax bill. It was passed when we had a surplus and the Eightieth Congress reduced expenditures and lived within the country's income.

The Eighty-first Congress has had the necessary votes to repeal that law if it wanted to. If it is as bad a law as they say it is, I challenge them to repeal in toto the tax reduction bill of the Eightieth Congress.

We have a deficit for the sole reason that too much money has been spent. The deficit would have been bigger if we had given to Mr. Truman everything that he has asked for. If the Congress had taken affirmative action on every request that Mr. Truman has sent down here since he was President, there is not anyone or any group that could write a tax law that would bring in enough money to pay for it.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, during the Eightieth Congress the first thing that was done was to perpetuate the wartime excise taxes which would have automatically expired on June 30, 1947. After that was done the tax bill was passed which President Truman refers to as the rich man's tax bill, a bill that deprived us of $5,000,000,000 a year in revenue. If that tax bill had not been passed over a veto, we would not have been in the red last year, this year, or next year. We would have plenty of revenue without going into the red and we would not have deficit financing at this time.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned until Thursday, January 12, 1950, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

TUESDAY, JANUARY 10, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 4, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal Spirit, we turn to Thee from the perplexities and uncertainties which daily beset us, and bewildered by the confusion of the world we pray for relief from disquieting, cowardly fears. Lead us past all shams and subterfuges to Thyself. Our littleness needs Thy greatness. Our weakness needs Thy strength.

Grant this dear land of liberty in hours that are heavy with crisis the strength of purpose to do justly and to love mercy. Save us from self-interest and self-righteousness, and make us the true servants of Thy will in this troubled time. We ask it in the Redeemer's name. Amen.

ATTENDANCE OF SENATORS

HOOVER COMMISSION REPORT ON EDUCATION—LETTER FROM EDGAR FULLER TO JAMES B. CONANT

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD, and referred to the appropriate committee, a letter addressed to President James B. Conant, chairman, schools and university committee, Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report, from Edgar Fuller, executive secretary of the National Council of Chief State School Officers, Washington, D. C., relating to the Hoover Commission report on education.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHIEF STATE SCHOOL OFFICERS,
Washington, D. C., December 27, 1949.

President JAMES B. CONANT,
Chairman, Schools and University Committee, Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report, Cambridge, Mass.

DEAR PRESIDENT CONANT: The Hoover Commission report on education is startling and disappointing. Without discussion, it dogmatically reverses the principal recommendations of its own excellent task force on education, this council, the National Education Association, the American Association of School Administrators, and most other professional groups and individual educators. It also does violence to the views of the great majority of citizens who believe in the American practice of keeping local, State, and Federal educational agencies politically nonpartisan.

The Commission's recommendation that the Federal agency for education be subjected completely to the executive orders of a political officer, the proposed Secretary of Welfare, violates our national principles and ignores our national experience in education. This would eliminate the already inadequate professional freedom of the United States Commissioner of Education and of the professional educators in the Office of Education. It would open the way for a measure of political domination of education and thought control approaching that by which Hitler and Stalin built their dictatorships. It would inaugurate a new pattern of Federal educational government, similar to politically controlled systems in foreign countries few Americans care to imitate. We believe the educational system developed in the United States is better for a democracy.

Another dogmatism, again without reasons given, resignedly suggests that educational functions must continue to be scattered throughout the noneducational executive branches of the Federal Government, without reference to its educational agency.

It is difficult to believe the Hoover Commission considered these matters thoroughly. Two members of the Commission led the successful effort to defeat Reorganization Plan No. 1 in the Senate last August. Plan 1 would have done for education exactly what the Commission recommended; it would have created a new Department of Welfare with complete absorption of the United States Office of Education. It is true that organization of Federal medical services was the major issue of the debate, but the fundamental issue of educational freedom from partisan political control was also emphasized by these two members of the Commission as well as by numerous other Senators.

There are other reasons to believe that the Commission was too greatly influenced in its recommendations on education by a small minority of its membership. One member has vehemently favored subordination of education to partisan political government at all levels, including appointment of local superintendents of schools by municipal officials rather than by nonpartisan school boards, while others have seemed almost unaware of the educational issues in the report.

Certain divisions of the Citizens Committee on the Hoover Report have attempted to convince Congress and the public that acceptance of the report must be on an all-or-none basis. Any questioning on any detail raises the cry that the omnipotence and infallibility of the Commission must not be doubted and brings the charge that "everyone believes in economy and efficiency in government until he is affected." In the case of education, economy and efficiency are to be found in the direction opposite from that urged by the Commission. We hope this all-or-none approach will not be tolerated by your Committee on Schools and Universities.

The cavalier treatment of education by the Commission will be increasingly resented both by the public and by professional educators as the facts become known. We intend to make them known and hope for your assistance. The terrible mistakes of the Commission in this field must not be uncritically swept into law along with others of its proposals. We hope you will use your great influence, as a friend of our American system of education, to defeat all recommendations of the Commission concerning education except that leading to transfer of the education functions of the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the United States Office of Education.

With highest personal regards, I am,

Sincerely,

EDGAR FULLER,
Executive Secretary.

OLEOMARGARINE AND BUTTER—LETTER FROM WILLIAM J. MURPHY

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a letter addressed to me by William J. Murphy, dairy commissioner of the State of North Dakota, dealing with the subject of oleomargarine and butter.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA,
Bismarck, N. Dak., January 6, 1950.

Hon. WILLIAM LANGER,
The Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am again asking for your help in behalf of the dairy farmers of North Dakota. The oleomargarine bill is before the Senate for debate, but I would first like to express the appreciation of the dairy farmers of North Dakota for the assistance you have given us during previous sessions of Congress on this controversial issue.

If the oleomargarine bill is passed as is recommended by the Senate committee with all restrictions removed as to licenses and taxes on the colored product without any safeguards set up to protect the consumers against the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine, colored and sold as butter, and to protect our entire national dairy industry; it will certainly mean a necessary curtailment in dairy farming.

North Dakota, as one of the major butter-producing States, is vitally interested in this issue; and when, in trying to promote the expansion of dairying in our State, we are met with the question by our dairy farmers as to what will happen to our butter industry if we are forced to meet competition with the unrestricted sale of oleomargarine colored to resemble butter.

As you probably know, all of the major dairy organizations in the Nation are in favor of a repeal of all licenses and taxes on margarines providing that safeguards are put into the bill making it illegal to color the product to resemble butter.

One of the largest manufacturers of oleomargarine, Lever Bros., as a plaintiff in a court case against one of their competitors, won a decision, which in effect stated that no other soap company could make a bar of soap colored red to resemble their Lifebuoy soap.

In a recent court case brought by the Food and Drug Administration against a soft-drink manufacturer, the court ruled that synthetic orange color and flavor could not be added to a soft drink, as such addition would, in effect, make the soft drink appear to be a more valuable product than it really was.

Through the years that we have had this controversial issue before Congress, we believe that it has been pretty well established that the only reason the oleomargarine people have for using the yellow coloring of butter, is to make it as nearly like butter as possible in order to fool the public.

Some oleo manufacturers are at the present time using dairy terms on their cartons, such as Grade A or Grade AA, which terms are used by the Federal Government in establishing grades on butter.

Speaking for the dairy farmer living in North Dakota, I would like to state that we would appreciate very much, anything you can do to prevent the wrecking of our North Dakota butter industry.

Thanking you again for your past efforts and assuring you that all of our farmers will appreciate anything you can do for them, I am,

Sincerely yours,

WM. J. MURPHY,
Dairy Commissioner.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WHERRY:

S. 2813. A bill for the relief of certain Mexican aliens; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LANGER:

S. 2814. A bill for the relief of Mir Abzul (Meer Afsar); and

S. 2815. A bill for the relief of Ali Washid; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. YOUNG (for himself and Mr. LANGER):

S. 2816. A bill to provide for the designation of the Heart-Butte dam and reservoir project in Morton County, N. Dak., as the Tschida Reservoir and Dam; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

S. 2817. A bill for the relief of Dr. C. A. Schenck; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McMAHON:

S. 2818. A bill for the relief of Mariella Ripiesi; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GREEN (for himself and Mr. LEAHY):

S. 2819. A bill to provide for an unemployment reinsurance fund; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. SMITH of New Jersey:

S. 2820. A bill for the relief of Marie Neubert; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. FLANDERS introduced Senate bill 2821, relating to the compensation of employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, which was referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, and appears under a separate heading.)

(Mr. MAYBANK introduced Senate bill 2822, to amend the Federal Deposit Insurance Law (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 264), which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. LEHMAN:

S. 2823. A bill to liberalize the loan provisions in the Water Pollution Control Act; to the Committee on Public Works.

By Mr. LUCAS (for Mr. MYERS):

S. 2824. A bill for the relief of Tannous Estephan; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina:

S. 2825. A bill to provide for the promotion of employees in the postal field service to meritorious and longevity salary grades; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

By Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma:

S. 2826. A bill to increase the borrowing power of Commodity Credit Corporation; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. RUSSELL:

S. 2827. A bill for the relief of certain Italian aliens; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GEORGE (by request):

S. 2828. A bill to extend the authority of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to establish and continue offices in the Republic of the Philippines; to the Committee on Finance.

OPERATION OF FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend section 12B of the Federal Reserve Act, which deals with the operation of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. The bill is the result of long and careful study by members of the staff of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, assisted by representatives of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the Secretary of the Treasury. Generally speaking, it provides for certain technical changes in the law which have been shown to be desirable in its administration during the 16 years of the Corporation's activities.

However, there are certain features of the bill upon which there is likely to be some disagreement, but the committee will undertake to iron out these differences and report the bill in a form that all can approve.

Perhaps the provision that will be most discussed is that dealing with assessments against insured banks. The money realized from these assessments is used to pay insurance losses and the operating expenses of the Corporation. Originally the Treasury and the Federal Reserve banks advanced $289,000,000 to provide the Corporation with its initial capital. Since beginning operation in 1934, the amount received from these assessments, which are at the rate of one-twelfth of 1 percent of total deposits, has enabled the Corporation to repay the amount advanced, to pay all losses and expenses for 16 years, and to build up its capital account to nearly one and a quarter billion dollars.

The bill I am introducing would authorize the Corporation to transfer to its capital account annually, beginning with the calendar year 1949, 40 percent of its net assessment income, and to credit the remaining 60 percent, pro rata, to insured banks against their assessments for the ensuing year.

Net assessment income is defined as the total assessment income during the calendar year less:

First. Operating costs and expenses during the year.

Second. Additions to reserves for losses during the calendar year, except that any adjustments to reserves resulting in a reduction of such reserves shall be added.

Third. Insurance losses sustained during the calendar year plus losses from any preceding years in excess of reserves.

Currently the Corporation's annual assessment income is approximately $120,000,000. Its losses and expenses during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1949, were $6,700,000, leaving $113,000,000 to be added to surplus. Application of the formula in this bill to these figures would permit addition to surplus of about $69,000,000, leaving $44,000,000, or a little more than one-third of the gross assessment income for the year, to be prorated among insured banks as a credit against assessments for the following year.

Another important change proposed is an increase in the maximum insurable account from $5,000 to $10,000. This would increase the number of insured accounts from 96 percent to 98.4 percent of the total, and would increase the amount of insured deposits from 44.8 percent to 52.4 percent of total deposits.

I am reminded that the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan is the only Member of the Senate who worked directly with that far-seeing group who were responsible for the establishment of the plan for insurance of bank deposits 16 years ago. I take the liberty of assuring him that in my opinion the people of the United States owe him a lasting debt of gratitude for his part in providing the Nation with this agency for restoring, strengthening, and maintaining confidence in our banks. Its successful operation and its present sound financial position fully justify his wise judgment and effective work in that behalf.

The bill (S. 2822) to amend the Federal Deposit Insurance Law (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 264), introduced by Mr. MAYBANK, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

COMPENSATION OF EMPLOYEES OF SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill relating to the compensation of the employees of the Senate and House of Representatives. I will say that in the closing hours of the last session Congress passed the legislative pay bill which continued the complicated structure of basic salaries and total salaries. The bill I am now introducing is simply intended to do away with the three percentage additions to basic salary and make the basic salary the same as the actual salary.

The bill (S. 2821) relating to the compensation of employees of the Senate and the House of Representatives, introduced by Mr. FLANDERS, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

ADDITIONAL PERSONNEL FOR OFFICIAL REPORTERS OF DEBATES, SENATE

Mr. HAYDEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 207), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate, in equal monthly installments from January 1 to June 30, 1950, to the official reporters of Senate debates and proceedings the sum of $6,000 for the employment of additional office personnel.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR DOUGLAS ON THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET

[Mr. DOUGLAS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a statement prepared by him on the budget submitted by the President on January 9, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

PROPOSALS AFFECTING THE DAIRY INDUSTRY AND AGRICULTURE

[Mr. WILEY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD material prepared by him relative to the reactions of the dairy industry of Wisconsin and the Pure Milk Products Cooperative of Fond du Lac, Wis., to proposals affecting dairying and agriculture, which appears in the Appendix.]

ADDRESSES BY HON. LOWELL B. MASON AND HON. JAMES M. MEAD AT SWEARING-IN CEREMONIES

[Mr. O'CONOR asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD addresses by Hon. James M. Mead and Hon. Lowell B. Mason at the swearing-in ceremonies of former Senator James M. Mead as a member of the Federal Trade Commission, November 16, 1949, which appear in the Appendix.]

BOOZE HAS NO CONSCIENCE—EDITORIAL FROM THE GRAND RAPIDS (MINN.) HERALD-REVIEW

[Mr. LANGER asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Booze Has No Conscience," published in the Grand Rapids (Minn.) Herald-Review of January 5, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

CONSTITUTIONAL ASPECTS OF THE CIVIL-RIGHTS PROGRAM—ARTICLE BY CHARLES WALLACE COLLINS

[Mr. EASTLAND asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Constitutional Aspects of the Truman Civil-Rights Program," written by Charles Wallace Collins, and published in the Illinois Law Review of Northwestern University, which appears in the Appendix.]

LIMITATION OF A BEQUEST TO DEMOCRATIC MEMBERS OF FAMILY—ARTICLE FROM THE ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the officers and members of the Senate are cordially invited to lend their ears to the reading of an unusual, interesting, and inspiring article that appeared in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch on the 7th of last December. A proper caption for this article would be "A prodigal son returns to his political home." An appropriate text for what it says would be: "Joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons, which need no repentance."

It is my hope that the Senate will consider the foregoing opinions fully justified by what I now proceed to read:

SEVEN HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND DOLLARS BEQUEST TO FAMILY IF ALL ARE DEMOCRATS

SACRAMENTO, CALIF., December 7.—Harvey B. Whitten, northern California peach grower, left most of his $750,000 estate to his two brothers and four sisters—and told them to become Democrats.

Whitten, who died November 17 at the age of 69, said this in his will filed for probate yesterday:

"I have specifically requested my brothers and sisters to renounce the Republican National Party, its policies, and platform, and to vote henceforth a straight Democratic National Party ticket.

"The reason for this is that my estate was accumulated solely under the Democratic administration. It is, therefore, my desire that no Republican Party member receive anything from the distribution of my estate."

Winston A. Langlois, attorney for the executors of the will, said Whitten's statement was probably merely to show his desire that heirs should be Democrats.

"There isn't any clause in the will which specifically disinherits a Republican," Langlois said. "But it's a nice legal question."

Mrs. Anna Whitten Ross, who came here from her home in Charlottesville, Va., for the hearing on her brother's will, said she didn't think there would be any trouble.

"In fact," she said, "I think the family are all Democrats. They may have strayed now and then. I think Harvey just wanted to be sure they stayed Democrats."

Mr. President, if there be any other wanderer from the Democratic pathway of happiness, prosperity, and peace, let him remember, that—

> While the lamp holds out to burn,
> The vilest sinner may return.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, for the past several days the pending business before the Senate has been H. R. 2023, and the amendment which has been offered in the nature of a substitute. Every time we reach the consideration of this very vital piece of legislation we find ourselves moving off on a slow boat to China. So, today, I should like to return to home port, to the pending business of the Senate, and continue with the discussion of this proposed legislation. I have observed that oleo seems to be a rather slippery subject, and it continuously melts away under the impact of Senate heat. We will try to keep the discussion and the consideration of the measure today calm, cool, and deliberate, so that there will be no melting away of this vital issue.

Mr. President, it is my intention to vote for the Gillette-Wiley amendment to H. R. 2023, the bill we are now considering; an amendment of which I am a cosponsor; an amendment which is in the nature of a substitute for H. R. 2023. I fully appreciate the inequity of continuing the restrictive taxes on oleomargerine.

I am happy to join with my colleagues, virtually all of whom agree to the desirability of abolishing those taxes. The dairy farmers of America have no intention of being parties to any tax device which is designed to interfere with consumer free choice.

The issue involved in the legislation we now consider, however, is deeper than the proponents of the legislation would have us know. The issue is not one of farmers versus consumers. The dairy farmers of America, who are themselves consumers, fully appreciate the desirability and the necessity of protecting the consumer interest in any piece of legislation to be considered by the Congress of the United States.

I repeat, the issue is not one of farmers versus consumers; the issue is rather one of recognizing the necessity of farmers and consumers joining together in opposition to monopoly and threatened monopoly. It is in this spirit and it is with this emphasis I desire to address myself to this body today.

The 558,609 dairy farmers, Mr. President, are small-business men, who devote at least the majority of their time to the processing or to the production of dairy products. Many hundreds of thousands more have dairying as a small part of their operation. Thirty-eight thousand nine hundred and thirty small-business men dairy farmers, Mr. President, work and live, bring up their children, and go to their churches, and engage in trade in my State of Minnesota. Many of them have organized cooperatives to assist them in their business activities. There are today more than 40,000 local plants all over the United States processing butter, milk, cheese, ice cream, and other dairy products. There are today 3,500 creameries scattered across our land and in every one of the 48 States, most of them owned by individuals or cooperatives. Butter, Mr. President, is a small man's operation. Butter making does not lend itself to a high-speed, concentrated, big-plant type of production because cream must be procured almost daily from literally millions of farms. Butter always has been and always will be essentially a small-business operation.

Contrast this picture with the industrial picture within the oleomargarine industry. The picture is one of growing monopoly. There are 28 oleomargarine companies, as compared to 3,500 creameries, as compared to 40,000 dairy plants, as compared to more than two and one-half million farmers who were engaged, in some part of their business, in dairying operations. There are 28 oleomargarine companies, but only 5 of these produce approximately two-thirds of the total amount in the United States. Processors and refiners of domestic oils used in the production of oleomargarine are even more limited in number, with merely a handful of companies controlling the industry.

I invite the attention of this body to the list of oleomargarine brands which account for 68.4 percent of the total sales of this product in the United States. They are as follows, "Nucoa," "Parkay," "Allsweet," "Blue Bonnet," and "Del-Rich." Only a few months ago the total production of these five major dominant brands were supplying more than 61 percent of the national output, as compared to a figure of 68.4 percent today—an increase, within a period of less than a year, on the part of these five companies, of 7 percent of the total oleomargarine production. The five largest oleomargarine names, therefore, are growing more and more dominant in the industrial scene.

The issue, therefore, is in a real sense one of small business versus big business. Evidence of this is seen in efforts of big business oleomargarine to advance its self-interest at the expense of the American dairy farmer. It is estimated that half a million dollars a month is being spent in behalf of this legislation by oleomargarine advertisers and publicity representatives. This is, of course, an expenditure which cannot be matched by small dairy plants, however numerous they may be. This explains to a large extent the reason why the case in behalf of the American dairy farmer has not been adequately presented to the American people.

My particular emphasis at this time, however, is not toward the five dominant brands in oleomargarine, dangerous as that threat which I have described may be. It is toward a sixth brand and the potentialities in its growth that I wish to direct the particular attention of my colleagues. The name of that brand is "Good Luck," and it is produced by the John Jelke Co., a property of Lever Bros. Co. operating in this country.

Although today the Good Luck brand of oleomargarine claims only 4.4 percent of the American oleomargarine market, the modesty of that assertion should not deceive us. Potentially, the international fats and oils cartel associated with the John Jelke Co. through its parent company, Unilever, Ltd., of London, England, is the greatest threat to the welfare of the American dairy farmer that has yet been posed by this synthetic age in which we live, and is therefore a threat to our whole economy. Unilever—with its headquarters in London—represents the largest single factor of the world supply of fats and oils, purchasing and processing more than 2,000,000,000 tons of the total 5,800,000,000 tons in world consumption.

A GIGANTIC MONOPOLY

The one company, Unilever, Ltd., alone, manufactures more soap and oleomargarine than any other company in the world, including 75 percent of all the oleomargarine eaten in Europe outside of Russia, and about 40 percent of the world's total consumption of oleomargarine. At the time of the purchase of the John Jelke Co., spokesmen for Lever Bros. Co. in London were quoted as saying that they expected their new American property to grow into the biggest oleomargarine company to be found anywhere. Representatives of the company have stated publicly that the John Jelke Co. would expand its operations to all 48 States, and that management had plans to build new oleomargarine plants on both the east and west coasts.

A company, Mr. President, of the vastness of Unilever, Ltd.—this great cartel—is well able to carry out such plans. It now owns throughout the world some 33 soap and toilet preparation plants; 57 plants for the manufacture of oleomargarine and other edible fats; 68 oil refineries; 24 oil-hardening plants; and more than 40 other plants of an auxiliary type. Those plans are situated in 43 different countries. In addition, Unilever, Ltd., owns vegetable-oil plantations covering 100,000 acres in the United Africa group, served by 15 oceangoing vessels and 2 large river fleets. Before the war Unilever used in its factories over 1,750,000,000 tons of oils and fats annually, and they did not come from the United States of America.

Unilever's announcement of its plans to make the John Jelke Co. the largest oleomargarine manufacturer in America is no idle threat, even in this country. Its subsidiary is already one of the two largest soap-manufacturing concerns in America, with plants in Edgewater and Hoboken, N. J.; Baltimore, St. Louis, Chicago; and Hammond, Ind. Last year it purchased Rayve cream shampoo, America's largest-selling hair preparation. It has entered the field of synthetic washing preparations with a new product called Breeze, and also produces an all-purpose soapless detergent for general household use under the brand name of Surf. It has built a plant exclusively for the manufacture of this product at Edgewater, N. J., adjacent to the Spry plant, which it also owns. Thomas Lipton Tea, another subsidiary of Unilever, Ltd., continues to expand its sales and to set new records in competition with American merchants.

DOMESTIC OIL PRODUCERS MAY LOSE MARKETS

This vast international cartel has every reason to be confident of its strong position on the basis of actual past performance. Over 41,000 tons of palm oil are produced annually on the company's plantations in the Belgian Congo alone. I wish to remind my fellow Senators that palm oil, before the war, was the preferred raw material for the production of oleo.

Only when the war interrupted overseas supplies were our domestic oleo manufacturers induced to turn to cottonseed and soybean oils as sources of vegetable fats. There is nothing to prevent the oleomargarine manufacturers from returning to coconut oil and palm oil, produced by the equivalent of slave labor overseas, as a price lever with which to deprive the American dairy farmer of his market for both butter and vegetable oils.

To those who think that the American cotton farmer and the American soybean farmer are going to find a market for the vegetable fats of those commodities, I would have them look into the record and see where the raw material came from prior to the war for the processing of oleomargarine. At the present time a false hope is being extended because the price of the raw material in the United States is much higher than the price of coconut oil or palm oil produced in the Belgian Congo or in the jungles of Africa.

Unilever's expansion of facilities is continuing on every continent. The Dutch branch of Unilever, Ltd., is already erecting new plants in Indonesia. How much more attractive, then, is the American market? The president of Unilever's Dutch branch, Dr. Paul Rykens, created a sensation in the London office when he declared that economic possibilities in Indonesia were greater than those in Malaya; and in Malaya they have been getting some of the cheapest palm oil and coconut oil obtained any place in the world. What sort of sensation was created, we may wonder, by the statement of the Lever Bros'. spokesman who said that he expected their American property, John Jelke Co., to grow into the biggest margarine company in the world?

Yes; Unilever is probably the world's largest trading company. In many places where it sells goods to natives, it has no competition whatever. It is in complete control of much of its raw-materials resources, since the United Africa Co. supplies fats and oils for approximately one-fourth of all Unilever's products. Company spokesmen have refused to discuss its progress in the development of synthetic proteins, but there is much to suggest that the company is attempting to make its position even more secure through bypassing altogether natural sources of supply.

ARTIFICIAL MILK WILL BE NEXT

Administrative health officials in London have guessed, off the record, that Unilever, the corporation, is working on the production of artificial milk made with vegetable fats and synthetic proteins. If these efforts are successful, the dairy farmers of not only the United States but of the world can look elsewhere for their livelihood.

The picture we have, therefore, is what the economists call monolithic corporate control on an international scale, seeking and planning to expand its activities and its profits. Its London office, Unilever, Ltd., is considered to be the world headquarters of this international organization, but real financial control remains here in the United States with its American corporation.

This international organization now maintains that the manufacturing and the sale of yellow oleomargarine should not be regulated in the interests of fair competition. This corporation presumes to say, instead, that such regulation is unfair to its own products. It further contends that the dairy farmer has no right to the color yellow, despite the fact that for centuries yellow has been the one unique color by which butter could be identified at sight. Yet this same Lever Bros. Co., this same corporation, the dominant unit in a worldwide fats and oils cartel, was prompt to rush into court, back in 1934, with a lawsuit against Jay's Chemical Corp. over an exactly similar question of color.

The defendant company had been in existence for about 2 years. It manufactured a competing article, which it called Life-Guard Health Soap. The record disclosed that the defendant's purpose in so doing was to devise a product substantially like that of Lever Bros. Co.'s in color, odor, shape, and general appearance, and to market it under a name which would be so like that adopted and used by Lever Bros. Co. that it could be fairly termed an imitation.

Oleomargarine manufacturers such as Lever Bros. Co. have been guilty of similar imitations in copying the texture, flavor, odor, and shape of butter. They have imitated the appearance and size of the conventional butter carton, and have even copied the quarter-pound prints in which butter is marketed. They have used brand names which suggest that their oleomargarine is freshly churned—right from the hot jungles of Africa—or otherwise produced by methods similar to those used for butter, and they have not hesitated to use on their packages and in their advertisements not palm trees but farm scenes to suggest the cool country freshness of butter.

But apparently the rules that protect corporations against infringement of established quality and good will fail to protect 2,500,000 small dairy farmers against the same injustices. The color red in soap is claimed to be the exclusive property of Lever Bros. Co. when it is applied to a health soap—we know what it is that eliminates "BO"—Lifebuoy—but the color yellow is in the public domain—it belongs to anyone—when Lever Bros. Co. wants to use it to imitate another manufactured product. This is particularly true when the product to be imitated is made, not by another corporation with tough lawyers of its own, but by a host of small creameries.

The color of the defendant's soap, Lever Bros. Co. claimed in its suit, while of a slightly different shade than that of Lifebuoy, was sufficiently close to it to cause confusion between the two articles. Lever Bros. Co. said such confusion cost it a loss of sales and profits; the company protested. How much closer and more confusing is the imitation of butter by oleomargarine, which now seeks to usurp the exact color of butter? Lever Bros. Co. obtained an injunction against this competitor because, the court said, the defendant had almost completely copied the plaintiff's product in an effort to gain an advantage from the good will of the plaintiff's business. Yet what excuse can there possibly be for coloring oleomargarine yellow other than to gain an advantage from the good will built up by the butter makers of this country? The sole reason for wanting to imitate butter's naturally yellow color is to benefit by butter's reputation as a quality spread.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Does the Senator mean to say butter is not colored?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Of course, the junior Senator from Minnesota does not mean to say butter is not colored. He merely says butter in its natural color is yellow, and yellow coloring is sometimes added to give it a sharper and more distinct color. But I am not so sure that the coloring competition arose when oleo started to color just a little bit, and the butter manufacturer said, "Possibly we had better color just a little bit more." So we have had a little competition as to which could get the most color into one of its spreads.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Is it not true that at certain times of the year butter is very white?

Mr. HUMPHREY. It is true that at certain times of the year butter is very light yellow, but it is not true that at certain times of the year butter is white. It is true that in its natural condition, after it has been bleached, oleo is white. Butter is never white. Butter may be slightly on the light side, but it is still, must I say, colored. It is similar to the case of any shade of color. For example, some people are dark, others are reasonably light.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Senator from Minnesota say the color of butter varies between a pale gold and a yellow?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Minnesota will be more than happy to accept that very fine, artistic description of the coloration of butter.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Is it not true at the present time that oleomargarine in a great many instances must be bleached before it can be sold?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes; I think that is true; because otherwise it would turn out to be green, if a certain kind of product were used; or it might turn out to be brown. We are perfectly willing that oleo shall have all the colors of the spectrum, all the colors of the rainbow, except the one color of which the cow has had a preemption for centuries.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Some years back, a Middle Western State permitted oleo to be sold, under condition, however, that it be colored green. I do not understand the Senator from Minnesota is making any such proposal, but is merely saying the color yellow in the spectrum should be reserved for butter.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is my position, and I may say that as my remarks are developed I think my friend from South Carolina will see that the junior Senator from Minnesota is most liberal and most generous in his treatment of oleo as a consumer product. I can make this rather summary statement at this time: There is no intention on the part of the junior Senator from Minnesota to deny the opportunity for oleo to be sold to the American consumers, and I think I shall be able to advance a program this afternoon which will meet with the hearty support of those who today are somewhat in doubt.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Would the Senator from Minnesota object to oleomargarine being sold in whatever color it comes, and would the Senator object to butter being sold in whatever color it might come, at any time, anywhere?

Mr. HUMPHREY. No. I think that would be a very good position. As a matter of fact, if we could return to the laws of nature—which at times are a great improvement over the laws of the Congress—I think we should find that about 80 percent of the time we would have butter that would be very sharply and perceptibly yellow, and that 20 percent of the time it would be, as my distinguished friend from Illinois said, of a light golden color. We would then permit oleo to have any of the normal colors which Mother Nature may have provided in its processes.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. So the Senator would not object, then, to butter being sold in its natural color, and oleomargarine being sold in its natural color?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I think that would be fine.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. If that be so, why is it the Senator objects to oleomargarine being colored yellow, and tries to confine the yellow color to butter exclusively?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Because I merely happen to believe that it has apparently been God's will—I do not know who else willed it—that butter be yellow. Butter was yellow long before the Congress of the United States had its first session. Butter was yellow long before we ever thought about excise taxes. Butter was yellow the first time someone got hold of a very ancient churn and started beating the cream.

We are not going to belabor merely the color, because I know my friend from South Carolina is interested in small business; I know he is interested in the welfare of the family; I know he is interested in the welfare of the consumer, and the welfare of the small-business producer. I do not believe that my friend from South Carolina is interested, for example, in one company which produces 40 percent of the oleomargarine of the world. I do not believe he is interested in the kind of cartel system under which three companies control more than 90 percent of the fats and oils of the world. I do not believe he is interested in the kind of economic system, if you please, which will literally gouge out of business and crush out of business the small independent operator. I believe the facts are disclosed in this address which point out to reasonable men that the greatest threat of the oleomargarine industry is not the threat of color competition; it is nct the fact that someone may want oleo in preference to butter. The threat is to the product of 2,500,000 American citizens who are the backbone of the country, the dairy farmers; to the 40,000 local plants, 3,500 creameries that are involved in the processing of dairy products.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I believe this is more a consumer's bill than it is a bill for the man engaged in agriculture, in the manufacture of oleomargarine, or in the dairy business.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am very happy that my friend has brought that fact to our attention. It is a consumer's bill. Before I have completed my remarks today I hope I shall have shown the Senator, if he will stay with me, that the consumer's interests have never been protected from monopoly, from cartels, and from the growing concentration of economic power.

There is plenty of evidence to show that this is a well-timed piece of legislation. The people of the United States have been told that monopolies were good for consumers. The A. & P. Co. is running a full-page advertisement telling how good monopolies are for the people. It is good for them, so long as there is competition; but when competition is destroyed, monopolies take all the market will bear. The only time the consumer is ever protected is when there is competition. It is not good for the consumer to have a monopoly administer prices and have control over production and distribution.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I should like to ask another question, if the Senator will yield further. At the present time, according to the way the law is written and the way in which oleomargarine is being sold, what difference would this bill make in the law?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The substitute proposal would repeal the taxes.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. At the present time the taxes do not have anything to do with protecting the public, so far as monopoly is concerned.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I point out to my distinguished friend that the manufacture of butter has never been known as a monopoly. Butter may have been high priced; there may have been a shortage of it, but the manufacture of it has never been a monopoly. We can still go to grandma's farm and get a crock of butter.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. The Senator does not mean to say that the price of butter at the present time is any protection to the public, does he?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The price of butter is a good protection to the public. As a matter of fact, the Congress of the United States, without a dissenting vote in the Senate, voted for mandatory price supports for butterfat. That is the will of the people. I shall not talk about that. I thought that was settled at the last session of Congress. That is the established policy of the country.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I think the Senator from Minnesota has missed the point I made. What I was trying to bring out was that at the present time he speaks of cartels which would come into effect if this tax were removed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Oh, no. The Senator from Minnesota does not speak of that. The cartels have been in effect from the very beginning. There has always been a monopoly of fats and oils. Three major companies have formed themselves into a combination operating all over the world.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. So this bill would have nothing to do with that situation.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I say to the Members of the Senate and to the people of the United States that if we can protect Lifebuoy soap, which may be a good soap, if we can protect the color of Lifebuoy soap—and this is the first time I ever heard of the Government of the United States wanting to protect the color red; I gathered that we were interested in red only on the negative side—we can protect the American farmer. When it comes to butter, we have to rely upon the ingenuity, the individuality, and the indestructibility of the independent American farmer.

I should like to offer to those who have seen what they consider to be an injustice in our claim that the color yellow should be reserved for butter the following example:

It may be argued that red and yellow are two different colors, and that the commercial rights and privileges pertaining to one are not applicable to the other. If that be the case, let me cite the experience of the Yellow Taxicab Co., which did not hesitate to take its smaller competitors to court in order to establish its sole and exclusive right to the use of the color yellow on its cabs. I say to the Members of the United States Senate that automobiles are not manufactured with a yellow color; they are not created with a yellow coating. They come out as a steel product with sort of an ashen gray color. They are then coated. Nevertheless, the Yellow Taxicab Co. took unto itself the color yellow, and has been protected by our courts.

When it comes to cabs and Lifebuoy soap, red and yellow are sacred, but it is different when it comes to 2,500,000 dairy farmers, who produce a product known as milk, and out of milk we get butterfat, and when we churn butterfat we get a yellow product called butter.

Are we to believe, then, that there is one brand of justice for big business and another for the small, independent farmer? Are 3,500 main-street creameries throughout our 48 States of less importance than the five giant Wall Street corporations that control the oleomargarine business? Are dairy farmers to be penalized because the nature of their business does not permit its concentration in the hands of a few? Is it wrong for the family-sized farm to exist, and for dairy farmers in thousands of villages and hamlets to spend their local creamery checks in the stores of local merchants?

It is difficult to combat powerful groups such as the oleo lobby. The profit from the manufacture and sale of their synthetic product is very large—large enough to afford elaborate publicity campaigns and heavy expenditures of advertising money. Tide magazine has credited the oleo interests with an advertising budget of $6,400,000 in 1947 and $5,900,000 in 1948. Much of this money was spent, as I have already said, to convince housewives that oleo should be colored yellow at the factory in imitation of butter. Where did this money come from? I have seen figures indicating that a complete oleo plant, turning out 40,000 pounds daily, can be installed for around $75,000.

I do not desire to deny the oleo business an opportunity to grow. I merely do not want it to grow all in one or two places. I do not want to see all the oleo business known by the names of one or two people. The oleo business can be decentralized if it wants to be. If a plant can be built for $75,000, there can be three or four plants in every State, and if that is done, and the people in a State want colored oleo, they can have it. The question then is, Are we going to let monopolies produce all the oleo, or are we going to say to the oleo people, "Look. We are not aiding and abetting cartels."

I want to say to some of my friends from the South who are sponsors of this bill that the South and West have been exploited for generations through discriminatory freight rates. They have been exploited for generations through higher interest rates. If we are to have some new business, Minnesota has room for new business, South Carolina has room for new business. There is room for new business all over America. I see the Senator from Vermont rising. Vermont has room for new business.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Does the Senator feel that if we are to enact legislation which will result in the concentration of oleo manufacturing in two or three places in the country, he and I might have to reconsider our position on the basing-point legislation? Certainly we are not only unwilling to be penalized in the location of these plants, but we should not be penalized further by making the product cost us a great deal more than it does those who happen to live in the immediately vicinity of where oleo is to be manufactured.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from Vermont for his question, and, believe me, he is right. But when he mentioned basing point, I knew that was the signal for my distinguished friend the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] to enter the debate.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I should like to say further that I am not yet changing my position on the basing-point measure, because I feel that the Senate is not going to impose any such unfair conditions on the States of Minnesota and Vermont and other States as some individuals apparently are willing to do.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Do I understand it to be the Senator's position that if some of the small dairies are going to be driven out of business we ought to let all the other small businesses be driven out of business?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The position of the junior Senator from Minnesota is that we ought not to drive small business out of business. But I think that if small business is to be driven out of business the people who are to do the driving ought to provide some program for making good the losses small businesses are going to incur.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. First, I should like to say that I regret very much that I was unable to hear the first part of the Senator's statement, because of an important meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee at which I felt obliged to be present.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I may say that I think the Senator missed the best part of the speech. I am sorry the Senator from Arkansas missed the first part of my speech.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I will say that I know of no one who can make a better speech than the Senator from Minnesota, and I regret very much that I could not be present to listen to the first part of his speech.

One or two matters I think should be straightened out in the RECORD. On January 5, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] stated, as appears on page 78 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—and, as I understand the Senator from Minnesota, it holds somewhat the same theory—as follows:

> The Lever Bros. Co., which has taken over the Jelke Co. and handles 75 percent of the sales in Europe and 68 percent of the sales in the United States, is the same concern which went into a United States court and asked for protection against imitation of their product.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Minnesota does not agree with that, because Lever Bros. control only 4.4 percent of the production of oleomargarine in the United States.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I wanted to make that clear for the RECORD, and to draw the Senator's attention to a letter from Lever Bros.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Is that letter in the RECORD?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It appears on page 166 of the House committee hearings. The letter states among other things that they had purchased John L. Jelke Co. on July 1, 1948, and it further states:

> The margarine industry uses very little imported oil, as the statistics show. We ourselves use none, nor do we import any margarine from outside the United States.

It further says:

> Our present share of the total production of margarine is between 4 and 5 percent.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is my statement on the floor today.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I am very glad the Senator has corrected that.

There is one other statement which I would appreciate the Senator allowing me to read. I shall read just two short paragraphs.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It is from an agency which I think the Senator will admit is certainly impartial on this sort of thing. I read from the report of the Federal Trade Commission on the concentration of productive facilities, of 1947, page 64. I do not believe this has been read into the RECORD.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I shall be happy to have it placed in the RECORD at this time.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I should like to quote it for the Senator's information at this time. It is not very long. I read from page 64 of the report of the Federal Trade Commission on the concentration of productive facilities, 1947. This is the statement of the Federal Trade Commission:

> The pattern of control in the processing and marketing of dairy products is rather similar to that of the meat-packing industry. Before World War I the dairy products industry was made up of small local units, either independently owned or under cooperative control. The contrast between the past and the present state of concentration is perhaps more striking in this field than in any other manufacturing industry.
> As the concentration curve for the industry shows, the two leading dairy corporations, National Dairy Products Corp. and the Borden Co., clearly dominate the industry, holding 27.5 and 21.4 percent, respectively, of the industry's net capital assets.

There is nothing comparable to this in the field of margarine manufacture. That is my statement. I continue to read from the report of the Federal Trade Commission:

> Thereafter the slope of the curve becomes much more gradual, with the third firm, the Carnation Co., holding 6.9 percent and five other corporations, with assets ranging from 2 to 4 percent of the industry's total, owning an additional 15.5 percent. Thus the eight largest firms control 71.3 percent of the total net capital assets of all corporations operating primarily in this field.
> Even these figures, however, substantially understate the degree of concentration affecting the ultimate consumer. This understatement stems from two factors: (a) Within the broad industry groups, concentration is frequently higher for important individual products; and (b) many of these individual products are highly perishable and can only be shipped within a limited market area, a circumstance which frequently results in a higher degree of concentration in local markets than is true of the country as a whole.

So if the Senator seeks to make a point about concentration in the margarine field, I say to him that it is much greater in the dairy field. We are interested in the maintenance of effective competition within a great industry. That is what we have traditionally relied upon to control prices.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I shall yield in a moment. I want to make the comment in reply to my friend, the Senator from Arkansas, that, first of all, he is talking about the dairy industry as a total pattern. The dairy industry as a total pattern is one thing, and the butter industry within the dairy industry is another.

I now yield to my colleague from Minnesota.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I want to join in the remarks made by my colleague, the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] on the question of concentration of dairy products. The junior Senator from Minnesota is entirely right when he says we are dealing with the entire dairy industry. We are not separating the butterfat. The question now before us is butterfat versus oleomargarine. It is not a question of the other dairy products. Butterfat is simply one of the products which are processed in relation to the other dairy products. The reason for the great growth in the condensed milk market was military need, and the processing of a product that was not perishable. That was one reason why an increase resulted in the cheese production during the war years.

But the entire question is: Are we permitting or will we permit, by the legislation proposed by the oleomargarine supporters, the destruction of the butter market? If the butter market is destroyed it means the destruction of the individual creamery, and the entire dairy industry will be put in a position where it must rely on the condensaries to a great extent in processing our whole milk, because there is no free market in the Midwest, in the great diversified area, for milk sales, except through butterfat or through condensed milk, or cheese, and the market today is flooded with cheese. That can be found by referring to the Commodity Credit Corporation's record of the amount of cheese purchased.

The butter market is likewise flooded, as can be found by reference to the record of the Commodity Credit Corporation as to the amount of butter it has purchased in order to maintain and support the price of butter. For that reason there has never been a time when it was so important to continue and to maintain the butter market as today.

The entire argument is not that of the condensaries. It is a question of whether a synthetic product, camouflaged to look and smell and taste like butter, processed entirely synthetically, shall take over and destroy the small individual farmer-owned, farmer-controlled, farmer-operated creamery throughout the entire diversified area of the United States.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank my colleague, the senior Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator from Minnesota and those who uphold the butter position, cannot have it both ways. They either must take the choice they are taking respecting the dairy industry, or uphold the butter position. The other day, when the Senator from Iowa was talking about this matter, and I challenged the importance of butter, he and those supporting him were talking all the time about the great dairy industry which I am as much interested in preserving as they are. When that point is before the Senate for discussion they refuse to delimit or dissociate butter from the over-all milk industry. But now when we talk about concentration, then it is said we must look only at the butter industry.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Oh, no.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If we look only at the butter industry, then the point becomes very evident that it is of such slight importance to the over-all dairy industry that here is no real occasion to become excited about it. But I think the Senators from the dairy States must consider either one or the other, in making their points, because they shift their position so rapidly that it is difficult for the public to follow.

One other thought: What I am interested in here is not the margarine industry at all. This is not a fight between the margarine industry and the dairy industry. What I am interested in is the consumer.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Oh, yes; we have been talking about that all afternoon.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator continually emphasizes the point that 500,000 persons are engaged in the dairy industry. Perhaps there are that many persons engaged in it, but there are 150,000,000 persons interested in the opportunity to obtain a nutritious food at one-half the cost of butter. That is what we are really interested in.

To put up this straw man of monopoly in margarine manufacture is entirely beside the point. I have no interest in margarine manufacturers at all. They are merely incidental to the whole question.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Of course.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. We are seeking an opportunity for people to purchase a perfectly good product free from artificial and unnatural restrictions——

Mr. HUMPHREY. Fine.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Which have applied to no other product in all the history of this country's legislation.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Marvelous. Now, since my friend, the Senator from Arkansas, is one of the most powerful defenders of States' rights, since he has said he does not believe the Federal Government should be interfering in these things, I say to my brother from Arkansas let us join together and we shall see that there is a little oleomargarine plant in every State of the Union, and we shall provide that those plants in every State of the Union will furnish jobs for small business, so that people of Arkansas can have Arkansas oleo, people of Minnesota can have Minnesota oleo—we are proud, too, you know, of our State—and so that people of California will be able to eat California oleo. Imagine the situation if people in California had to eat Florida oleo. There would be great social unrest in our country, in that case. [Laughter.]

What are we saying, Mr. President? We are saying to the proponents of this measure, "If you want white oleo, like oleo is before you get around to tinkering with it and coloring it——

Mr. FULBRIGHT. How about butter? It is white, too, before you get to tinkering with it and coloring it. The Senator from Minnesota also knows that some oleomargarine is yellow, but the law prevents it from being sold with that yellow color; under the law, it cannot be sold until it is bleached white. Let us not confuse the issue, I say to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Some oleo is green, too, and it is necessary to bleach it. All of it must be bleached.

We are saying that those who want oleo can have it. Let us keep the record clear. They can have oleo colored any color they wish to have it. It can even be colored any hue of the rainbow, or even can be colored to look like Neapolitan ice cream. Those who wish to have oleo can have it colored any color they want to have it colored. It can even be put in boxes which look like butter boxes.

The manufacturers can even print on the boxes pictures showing dairy herds in Minnesota. We do not complain about that.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Referring to the figures previously given by the Senator as to the monopolistic trend, the correct figure is that six companies control 60 percent of the total production of oleo; and, in the same way, eight dairies control 71 percent of the milk production. So we are about even; there is no great difference in that respect.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Arkansas says we are even, although of course that is a very debatable and disputable point.

All I say is that since the Senator from Arkansas has raised the noble, humanitarian cry about the interests of the consumer, let me ask, Who is opposed to the interests of the consumer? I will tell you, Mr. President. Every monopoly in the United States is opposed to the interests of the consumer. The monopolies are opposed to the consumer; the cartels are opposed to the consumer. Can he show me a single instance where a cartel ever helped a free-enterprise economy or ever did a small-business man any good? Cartels have gone down in infamy in our country. We are supposed to be breaking them up. But here it is said we are trying to hurt the consumer by denying him a chance to get oleomargarine.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Would the Senator from Minnesota be agreeable to making the same provision as to color applicable to milk and cheese? Is it satisfactory to the Senator from Minnesota, with regard to the use of artificial color, that exactly the same provisions shall be applicable to butter; and also that exactly the same provisions be applicable to milk, namely, that no milk can be shipped in interstate commerce?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Milk is ordinarily white; is it not? White milk is obtained even from brown cows. [Laughter.]

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Oleomargarine is ordinarily yellow. If its sale in its yellow color were not prohibited by law, and if oleomargarine were not required to be bleached white, that would be different. Butter is ordinarily white, during a large part of the year; but by law the butter industry is given a specific exemption from the necessity of complying with the same provisions with which the producers of oleomargarine are required by law to comply. The Senator from Minnesota overlooks the fact that affirmative legislation of the Congress has provided these restrictions; it is not a natural condition at all. This was done by affirmative legislation. That legislation requires the manufacturers of oleomargarine to make oleomargarine white in color. That is not its natural color. It has that white color only as a result of legislation enacted by the Congress.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I suppose the Congress also makes the oleomargarine manufacturers make oleomargarine smell like butter, too; and I suppose the Congress also makes them put sodium benzoate in it, as a preservative, too, and makes them put a picture of a cow on the outside of the oleomargarine carton, too. Congress has absolutely nothing to do with all that.

As I said before in this debate, butter was yellow before the Congress of the United States ever was heard of. So it is about time that the Senator from Arkansas understood that the natural color of butter is yellow.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Then, why is butter colored artificially?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am sorry that some of my friends in the Senate have digressed from the oleomargarine debate to discuss Formosa. We have had too much trouble in the course of this debate with Formosa, whereas we should have stuck to one issue.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I ask the Senator to invite a vote on this issue. I am perfectly willing to have it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Minnesota is but one of the buck privates in the ranks. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], whom I now see presiding over the Senate, which is a place entirely fitting and appropriate for him, and my compatriot, the Senator from Vermont, will settle the schedule for the vote.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GILLETTE in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I am sure the Senator would like to have it pointed out that apparently the Senator from Arkansas does not expect that oleomargarine will be made from soybean and cottonseed oil in the future, because he said that the natural color of oleomargarine will be yellow. I understand that in order to make oleomargarine a natural yellow color, palm oil is the ingredient used. But it is very evident from the Senator's remarks and any suggestion that oleo be permitted to use a natural yellow color, that he contemplates foreign oils will be used in its manufacture in the future, rather than cottonseed and soybean oil, which do not make an attractive coloring for the finished product.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It is sort of a greenish color; is it not?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I wish to state that the Senator is not correct. We had before the committee examples of cottonseed-oil oleomargarine with a color as yellow as butter. I do not expect everyone to agree with my suggestion, because I know the butter people will not agree to eliminating the artificial color of butter. So I have no expectation of securing such an agreement. I only propose it to show that the butter people are just as much interested, if not more so, as the oleomargarine people are in coloring their product.

All we ask is equal treatment. That is all we ask. We ask no favored treatment such as that which has been given to butter throughout the years. We do not ask to be relieved from the duty of putting on the carton a statement of what is inside the carton. Exemption from that requirement is the sole privilege of the butter people. That is an advantage they have had for many years. We do not seek that kind of advantage.

I know of no one who has any idea of using coconut oil for oleomargarine, in order to obtain a yellow color, because I know the butter people will not agree to the sale of yellow oleo or to the elimination of the use of artificial color in their own product.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Then will the Senator from Minnesota ask the Senator from Arkansas whether the oleomargarine people will agree to include in this bill a provision that oleomargarine shall not at any time be sold or advertised as a dairy product? That seems to be the principal bone of contention now, namely, that the oleomargarine people insist upon selling their product as a dairy product. The only excuse is that it contains a little bit of skim milk.

All of us know that it is widely misrepresented as a dairy product. I hold in my hand an advertisement clipped from a Vermont newspaper of last week. Vermont is one of the States that is said to be so tough on the oleomargarine industry that the consumers in Vermont cannot get oleomargarine, according to the inference which we might draw from the arguments which have been presented here.

Here is the advertisement:

Oleo, Golden Maid.

It is neither golden, nor do I suppose any maid had any part in its preparation. But there is the misleading inference that it is yellow oleomargarine. It is not.

After the words "Golden Maid," we see where the rub comes on the consumer:

One pound package, 19 cents.

I do not know why oleomargarine is being sold so cheaply in certain butter States at this time. Probably there is a reason for it. Nineteen cents is only about 10 cents a pound above the cost of manufacturing oleomargarine, and of course that is a very narrow spread for the oleomargarine interests.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It is a very efficient industry; that is the reason for it.

Mr. AIKEN. But if the oleo interests were entirely sincere, I think they would not hesitate to agree that it should not be sold as a dairy product.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I should like to proceed for a while. I informed some of my colleagues that we would try to get through with this portion of the discussion within a reasonable time; but the area of reasonableness was left behind about 20 minutes ago. So I should like to carry on. I shall yield later, because I do not desire to choke off questions. I think we have about exhausted this part of the discussion; but let me say that I have plenty more controversial material to present, and I wish to preserve some of the enthusiasm which still remains in the body politic here.

At this time, let me say that it is worth noting that the price of oleomargarine, as my colleague, the Senator from Vermont, said a moment ago, tends to follow the price of butter, and not the cost of its ingredients. This has been true since the very beginning of the industry, as ample testimony before the Senate Committee on Finance has demonstrated.

Government spokesmen have reported that the spread between grocery prices and farm prices is too wide. We have read a great deal about that. The percentage of the consumer's dollar for oleo returned to the farmer was a mere 31 percent in January 1949, as compared with 73 percent of the consumer's dollar for butter received by the dairy farmer. The price of farm ingredients used in a pound of oleo during January 1949 amounted to only 11.38 cents per pound, while the gross farm value of ingredients in a pound of butter in the same period was 54 cents.

A PRIME EXAMPLE OF ADMINISTERED PRICES

For several years now the Federal Trade Commission has requested that it be given an appropriation to enable an exhaustive investigation into administered prices in American industry. So far, no such investigation has been approved.

I submit that there is indisputable evidence of a classic example of the existence of administered prices in one industry that comes down here asking favors of this Congress year in and year out. There can be no doubt that in the oleomargarine industry there exists a veritable model of a tightly knit monopoly with an example of administered prices that is matched by perhaps no other leading industry.

I should like to list a few of the factors which indicate that existence of this monopoly, and the prevalence of administered prices.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a very short observation?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Does the Senator wish to imply that the manufacturers of oleo are asking a favor?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator was not only leaving the implication; the Senator was making the assertion.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Does the Senator feel that to ask for the removal of a positive application of law designed to restrict the manufacture of oleo is asking a favor?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator has attempted all day long to tell his distinguished friend from Arkansas that insofar as the proponents of the Gillette-Wiley bill are concerned, we believe in the removal of taxes—which was the first hue and cry of the oleo industry. There is no argument about that. Secondly, we believe every American ought to be able to buy oleo in interstate commerce.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Does the Senator feel that there is any indication of administered prices in the fact that oleo is at this time advertised to sell at 19 cents a pound in Vermont, whereas it is selling for 35 cents a pound in the District of Columbia?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I shall come to that. That is not only administered prices; it is exactly what I meant by one of the facets of the monopoly structure, which enables the price to be handled in that manner for the purpose of destroying competition.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Is the oleo to which the Senator from Vermont referred yellow or white?

Mr. AIKEN. It is advertised as Golden Maid oleo.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Is it yellow or white?

Mr. AIKEN. If it is yellow oleo, it is being sold in violation of the State law. I think it is white.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator recognizes there is a difference. A big part of the difference is represented by the tax.

Mr. AIKEN. It is not a tax on the part of the State of Vermont.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I mean a tax on the part of the Federal Government. It is a tax of 10 cents.

Mr. AIKEN. Is there any significance in the fact that yellow oleomargarine, for instance, if it could be sold legally, would be sold for 29 cents a pound in the State of Vermont, while in the District of Columbia the consumer is asked to pay 35 cents a pound?

Mr. HUMPHREY. He pays 45 cents a pound.

Mr. AIKEN. As the Senator from Minnesota says, it is a completely administered price. The price is made what the manufacturers want it to be. They can sell it at a loss in one State, for a particular purpose, and make up the loss by overcharging in another area of the country.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Minnesota wishes to proceed, because I think what has been pointed out by the distinguished Senator from Vermont, and the conflict which comes from the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, will be developed probably in the remarks on the administered price structure.

PRICE BEARS NO RELATIONSHIP TO COSTS

The price of oleomargarine, perhaps more than that of any other product, exemplifies the custom of charging whatever the traffic will bear. Throughout recent years the price of oleomargarine has borne no relationship whatsoever to the cost of producing it. Several different statistical series can be cited to prove this contention.

For example, I should like to refer you to quotations showing the percentage of fats and oils prices to the price of oleomargarine. If one examines this ratio over the years since 1925, he will find that the percentage of fats and oils prices ranged from 45 percent to 76 percent. Let us button down what that range means. Briefly it means that the ratio of the actual price of oleomargarine to the price of its principal ingredients has deviated by almost 100 percent. In other words, the price of oleo, in reference to the cost of the commodities which have gone into the oleo and the labor which has gone into it, has deviated 100 percent.

The failure of oleomargarine prices to reflect costs was particularly apparent last summer. Between May and November 1948, for example, cottonseed oil dropped from 41 to 20 cents a pound, or almost 50 percent. However, during that same period, the price of oleo declined from only 44 to 38 cents a pound, or less than 15 percent.

Here is an unanswerable demonstration of the complete control over prices maintained by the oleomargarine trust.

I now submit for the record a chart showing the relative price movements of butter, oleomargarine, butterfat, and fats and oils used in oleomargarine from 1925–48, taken from the Senate hearings on this bill found as table 25, pages 114 and 115 of the hearings. These data are based on official Department of Agriculture price statistics.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[2] Prices of butter shown reflect actual wholesale trading and include the wholesale mark-up permitted under OPA, MPR as amended.

Mr. HUMPHREY. There is another series of data which prove the same point. I refer to the Department of Agriculture's figures showing the farmer's share of the retail price of oleomargarine. This series is available from 1919 to the present. It shows that the farmer's share of the retail price of oleomargarine has ranged from a low of 19 percent to a high of 36 percent. This very wide deviation in relationship of the farmer's share to the retail price proves once again that the price of oleomargarine bears very little relationship to the cost of producing it.

It should be apparent that if oleomargarine prices were set competitively, the relationship of its going price to the price of the principal ingredients used in its production would remain fairly constant. The fluctuation or deviation over the years, if any, would be relatively minor in scope and extent. Certainly no genuinely competitive product could show the very extreme deviation in relationship of price to costs reported for oleomargarine.

In order to prove the point, just consider what comparable data show for butter. The farmer's share of the retail price of butter shows a gradual trend upward over a period of years, rising from 69 percent in 1919 to the current figure of around 80 percent. The fluctuation through the years was never more than a few points. This, of course, is what you would expect, since butter must reflect its cost of production, and the farmer who produces it gets the overwhelming share of the sales price.

OLEO PRICE RATIO TO BUTTER ALWAYS THE SAME

While oleo prices do not reflect the cost of producing the article, they always bear the same relationship to butter prices. Roughly, throughout the years, oleo prices as reported to the Department of Agriculture are just about half the price of butter for the same period. That was the situation in 1923 and in 1933, and was still the situation in 1946 and 1947. The price of the product is carefully controlled as the Senator from Vermont pointed out, to meet the price of butter.

NUMBER OF UNITS IDEAL FOR ADMINISTERED PRICE INDUSTRY

The make-up of this industry readily explains its ability to control prices regardless of the trend in production costs. Five major companies—the Senator from Arkansas says six—turn out more than 65 percent of the total production of oleomargarine, as we have seen. The industry as a whole numbers only 28 concerns.

There is probably no other industry in the country, comparable in sales volume, which is dominated by so few concerns. The steel industry, for example, which we often talk about as being one of the trusts, one of the monopolies, includes more than 100 separately owned companies, and there are several hundred meat-packing concerns.

The tightly knit control exercised by these relatively few large manufacturers is evidenced by the behavior of oleomargarine prices, which we have already cited.

RAW MATERIALS TIGHTLY CONTROLLED

One other characteristic of an administered price industry is also present in the case of oleomargarine. By the way, Mr. President, if I may digress for a moment, we have heard a good deal of complaint about Government-controlled prices. During the days of wartime emergency we had Government-controlled prices. There was a good deal of discussion and a good deal of criticism in connection with Government-controlled prices. But what do we find in a monopolistic condition? We find a privately operated type of control, a monopoly type of price control. That is what we mean by administered prices. I want my position to be quite clear on the floor of the Senate. I do not want Government-controlled prices and I do not believe in monopoly control. I believe in a competitive, free economic system. I think there is no substitute for competition as a regulatory mechanism. Competition is the best regulatory mechanism that has ever been created. But I make the reservation that if prices are to be administered, if prices are to be regulated and are to be controlled, I should rather have them controlled by the Government, in which I as a citizen have one vote, than to have them controlled by some corporation, run by a handful of people. At least under Government control we have some democratic control. But prices administered by a monopoly are administered prices without reference to cost, without reference to production, without reference to distribution.

I was pointing out that I presumed everyone in the Senate knows that one of the characteristics of an administered-price industry is the matter of control over raw materials. The principal raw materials used in the production of this butter substitute are the vegetable oils. I presume, too, that everyone in this Senate knows that the production of processed vegetable oils is under the control of three large manufacturers of shortening and cooking fats. They dominate the entire market for these crucial raw materials in the oleomargarine industry. I need not tell you that the relationship of these three companies to the large manufacturers of oleomargarine is as close as one would expect to find in an administered-price monopoly.

Last year a subcommittee of the House Agricultural Committee conducted exhaustive hearings into the speculation in vegetable oils. The extent of control over the prices of processed vegetable oils revealed in these hearings proves the existence of the tight control over raw materials essential to the existence of an administered-price industry.

MANIPULATION OF SPREADS BETWEEN WHITE AND COLORED

I should now like to point out some of the manipulation that goes on in this field of the spreads of oleo. Still another evidence of the existence of an administered-price monopoly in the oleomargarine industry is the manipulation of the spread between white oleomargarine and colored oleomargarine.

Recently an advertisement appeared in an El Paso, Tex., newspaper which showed colored oleo to be selling for 30 cents a pound more than was the uncolored product. This in the face of a justifiable spread of silghtly more than 10 cents. In other words, the price went up 27 cents a pound. It is our claim that when all restrictions are taken off, the so-called low price to consumers is not going to be there. The evidence is quite clear that where there are no restrictions, the price of colored oleo starts going up, regardless of how much it costs to make it, and regardless of what the farmer's share may be. There are hundreds of cases of record to show that the price of colored oleo has varied from the normal 10 cents to as high as 27 cents, and even to 30 cents.

A survey of nine cities in January 1949 showed an average difference between uncolored and colored oleo of 21.8 cents a pound. In other words, the minute the manufacturers get the right to color the product, they put the price up. They take all the market will bear, while the five or six major producers put the unprecedented profits in their pockets. This evidence can be found on page 137 of the Senate hearings.

This exorbitant spread between uncolored and colored oleo naturally bears no relationship to production costs or any other economic factor; it represents simply the ability of a monopoly to gouge the public. It is, of course, within their power, too, to reduce the spread to suit their political purposes, and there is evidence that perhaps they may be doing so. It should be emphasized, however, that this is not only an example of the workings of an administered price monopoly, but is also a clear warning to consumers that they cannot expect cheap oleo if the bans on production and sale of yellow oleomargarine are lifted.

Once the bans are lifted to allow yellow oleo to be sold freely, and once there is no competition from uncolored oleo, the price spreads, taken from actual quotations posted by stores, show what is going to happen: yellow oleo will rapidly rise in price, approaching the price of butter. This is what we would expect from the existence of an administered-price monopoly where there is no competition.

Naturally, an administered-price monopoly exists only to make money. The profits which have been earned in oleomargarine constitute one additional evidence of the existence of the type of monopoly we are here discussing. Very few of the oleomargarine makers issue reports on their financial operations. Indeed, the National Association of Margarine Manufacturers last year flatly refused a request from the Senate Finance Committee for data on costs, sales prices, and profits.

There would be a great hue and cry in the Senate if some labor organization refused to submit its books. When the oleomargarine industry is asked by the Finance Committee to produce such data it says, "That is too slippery a subject for us; we cannot afford to bring it up here."

The association maintained that such data simply were not available.

However, from stockholders' reports which have been issued by some of the principal members of the industry, we know that the profit on oleomargarine has ranged from 21 percent to 34 percent on capital investment.

The data compiled by the Department of Agriculture show that the profit margin, as spread between the retail price and the cost of raw materials in the case of oleomargarine, is 1,100 percent greater than the profit on butter.

Let us again compare this picture with the operations of the butter industry, where prices much more accurately reflect costs of production. I remember when I was on a college faculty that college textbooks on economics and monopoly cited butter as one of the relatively few commodities whose prices were set in a competitive market in an open commodity exchange where anyone may bid and sell.

That is free enterprise. There are too many people roaming around the country talking about free enterprise who do not believe in it. The persons who put up the biggest cry about free enterprise are those who have been monopolizing the industries of the country.

The number of producers of butter now exceeds 3,500—a far cry indeed from the number of oleo producers—28 in all. The profit margin on butter is smaller than on almost any other food product reported to the Department of Agriculture. The costs, expenses, and profits of the butter industry are an open book and were freely reported to the Senate Finance Committee last year. There is no mystery about costs and prices in butter, as there is in oleo.

The current butter-oleo controversy, therefore, presents two diametrically opposite types of industry organization. In the oleomargarine industry we have an example of an administered-price monopoly of the most modern vintage, fostered and developed by gigantic advertising outlays, and maintaining its price control by all of the new economic techniques which so concern the Federal Trade Commission, the Department of Justice, the Temporary National Economic Committee, and the other groups that have studied the monopoly problem. Oleo is an ideal case study for investigators of administered-price monopolies.

On the other hand, we have the butter industry whose prices are set in one of the few remaining open, competitive, commodity exchanges, and the production of which flows from thousands of small- or medium-sized plants located in every State in the Union.

In conclusion, therefore, Mr. President, I urge that the appropriate committee of the Senate be directed to conduct a comprehensive investigation into the existence of monopoly in the oleomargarine industry. The system of administered prices that exists in this industry exacts its toll from millions of housewives. Southern farm interests have been deluded and preyed upon by this great aggregation of concentrated economic power.

We cannot wait much longer for the Federal Trade Commission to receive authority and funds to go ahead with its investigation. I believe that, instead of acting on the oleo-sponsored legislation now before us, we should attempt to find out what these giant corporations are up to in seeking to escape Federal regulation of their product.

A drop of 25 percent in the price of butter from the present level of 62.5 cents per pound, or a 16.5 cents decline, would mean a loss of $207,000,000 to dairy farmers. For the milk used in manufactured dairy products other than creamery butter, a decline of 19.5 cents per pound of butterfat would result in a loss of $213,000,000. Assuming that a third of the milk used for fluid milk and cream would directly reflect the same decline of 25 percent, a loss of $145,000,000 would occur, at a time when farm income is going down, at a time when farm machinery has gone up an average of 26 percent and farm prices have gone down an average of 52 percent.

This is no time to hurt the farmers. Dairy farmers are the backbone of a diversified farm economy and should be protected. The Members on this side of the aisle should be particularly aware of this fact.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator seems to be surprised that so many on this side of the aisle are supporting the bill. I believe the Senator participated in the writing of the Democratic platform.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Proudly so.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. And the platform contains a plank, in the writing of which the Senator participated——

Mr. HUMPHREY. Proudly so.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Calling for the repeal——

Mr. HUMPHREY. For the repeal of the oleo tax, and that is exactly what we are doing.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Oh, no; the Senator knows very well that is a subterfuge. The only way to interpret that plank is that oleo be freed from the restrictions imposed on it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Since the Senator seems to be very much interested in having all the planks of the Democratic platform carried out, may I say that there are a few others with which we have had some trouble in the Senate, such as the civil-rights plank. The Democratic platform says, "We stand for the repeal of the oleo tax," and that is exactly what our substitute proposes, repeal of the oleo tax. The Democratic platform did not say that we stand for the repeal of a regulation which prevents fraud. We said we stood for the repeal of the oleo tax, and as a member of the platform committee, and a member of the committee on the drafting of the platform, I knew full well what was in that platform. If the Senator from Arkansas will stand with me on the Democratic platform, we are going to have some real results, because in that platform we have an anti-poll-tax plank, an antilynching plank, and a fair employment practices plank.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I have never pretended that I approved those, and I do not think there is any reason to interpret the platform as meaning that we were for a repeal of the tax and at the same time were for destroying the industry. The only reasonable interpretation to be made is that we would free oleo of the restriction put upon it by law 60 years ago. If the Senator's interpretation is correct, of course, that plank is completely meaningless. His interpretation is that we should remove the tax and kill the whole industry by preventing the shipment of the product in interstate commerce.

Mr. HUMPHREY. My interpretation of the platform is only that which would come from the average, normal mind. I read in the platform that we stand for the repeal of the tax on oleomargarine. There are no footnotes, there is no description, it is merely for a repeal of the tax, and that is exactly what we are proposing in our substitute, a repeal of the tax on oleomargarine. But not only do the producers of oleo want the tax repealed, but they are interpreting the platform to mean that there should be abolition of the butter industry. We did not put that in the platform. If we had put it in the Democratic platform, what a great crowd there would have been on the other side of the aisle.

The farmers of this country had some idea what was in this platform. Ask our Republican friends. They will state that the farmers had a great deal to do with this platform and with what happened in the election.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator is on the side of two and a half million as against one hundred and forty-seven and one-half million. Does not the Senator know of the opposition of the labor organizations? Is the CIO for the repeal of the tax?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I understand the CIO is for the repeal of the tax, and so is the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. And the Senator interprets the position of the CIO to be for the repeal of the tax and the destruction of the industry.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Minnesota has learned never to interpret. He reads and tries to understand what he reads. The labor movement speaks for itself and does so very well. The Senator does know that some representative of the American Federation of Labor stand with us on the substitute.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. How does the Senator explain the result in the Ohio election, the last time the people had an opportunity to pass on this question?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Minnesota has never tried to interpret the results of any Ohio election, either this one or the one to come in the future. I have enough trouble in Minnesota without trying to interpret results in Ohio.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator is leaving the impression that the people of Ohio are somehow peculiar and different from the people of Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. No; the Senator is leaving the impression that the people of Ohio are masters of their own destiny.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. He knows they voted for the abolition of the restriction on oleomargarine. Does the Senator think the same principle should be applicable to the cheese industry, and that there should be many little factories in each State, and no shipments from other States?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I do not like to be taken into a discussion of the doctrine of eventualities. I prefer that we confine ourselves to the legislative proposal at hand, which is that of preventing fraud of the consumer.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I should like to, also and if we can get an agreement to vote, I should like to make the time any hour the opponents are willing to have a vote taken. I hesitate to say this is a filibuster, but, after all, some of the leaders have been very reluctant to speak on the question before the Senate. A week has passed, and only three speeches have been made by the opponents. We are perfectly willing to vote on the bill today, now.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I told the Senator yesterday that we all stand ready to cooperate with him to arrive at a unanimous-consent agreement to get a vote. I agree that prolonged and extended debate that borders on the nature of a filibuster is beneath the dignity of this body, and I think we should come to a decision.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. GILLETTE. I was very much interested in the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] that up to now there had only been three speeches made in opposition to the oleo bill. Up to now there has been only one speech made by the proponents of the Poage bill. While it was a magnificent speech, and worthy of any Senator, yet it is the only real speech which has been made here by the proponents of the Poage bill up to the present time.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I appreciate the Senator's comment.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Minnesota would like to carry on and complete his speech, Mr. President, so we can some how meet the offer of the Senator from Arkansas to conclude this debate.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield once more?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes; I am happy to yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GILLETTE. Noting the nervousness of the Senator from Arkansas, I can readily understand his anxiety to conclude the debate when such a speech is being made as we are hearing here today.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished colleague from Iowa.

One of the first victims of this monopoly, therefore, will be the American dairy farmer and his family, another small-business victim to monopoly control. The consumer may well be the second victim of this monopoly control.

THE GILLETTE-WILEY SUBSTITUTE

The Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment, of which I am a cosponsor, is one I shall support because it comes close to reconciling the need of removing all taxes and license fees on oleomargarine at the same time as it maintains fair competition between the two commodities. In principle, it is similar to scores of fair-trade laws undertaken to protect small businesses against the encroachments of big business and growing monopoly. Fair-trade laws are a kind of price which the American society must pay to protect itself against the injustices, oligarchical tendencies, and eventual prohibitive cost of monopoly control. Whatever temporary price benefits the consumer may believe that he gains from allowing the potential monopolies to stifle, ensnare, and strangle the small-business man and the small farmer, will soon prove to be completely illusory and, in fact, a serious and grave body blow to American freedom as our economy grows more and more monopoly-controlled and directed.

I have emphasized throughout my whole speech that whatever temporary little relief seems to come to the consumer will represent a dear price to pay for what will ultimately happen in the long run, once the source of our competitive economy has been either severely damaged or destroyed. The price we pay in supporting the American small-business man and the American farmer is indeed a small one when we examine the vital role played by the American middle class, and when we see the advantages to our democracy of preserving as large an area of competition as we can to withstand the encroachments of big business.

That, Mr. President, is my case before the American people.

In conclusion, Mr. President, what are the arguments of those supporting H. R. 2023? First, oleo taxes will be repealed. That is no argument. This argument, Mr. President, is met and fully answered by the amendment in the nature of a substitute of which I am a cosponsor and am actively supporting. The Gillette-Wiley substitute repeals all oleo taxes.

Secondly, the argument of those supporting H. R. 2023 is that by removing restrictions on colored oleo, specifically yellow-colored oleo, we protect the interests of the consumer. Now let us examine this latter argument. The legislation that I am supporting does not deny the right to produce and sell oleo either in interstate commerce or within a State.

Oleo in its natural form, oleo that has been bleached, that has added preservatives, that has added vitamins, that has added synthetic flavor making it resemble and taste like butter, is given full opportunity to be sold in interstate commerce. The consumer can get oleo if the consumer wants it. The consumer can get oleo, but not oleo that masquerades as butter, that perpetuates a fraud on the people.

In the course of my remarks I pointed out that an oleo-processing plant capable of producing 40,000 pounds of oleo per day can be established at a minimum cost of $75,000, this according to the testimony of the Department of Agriculture. If those who are interested in oleo and not in oleo monopoly want to sell yellow-colored oleo, the solution to their problem lies in the construction of hundreds of small oleo-producing plants producing within the several States, rather than 28 producers throughout the United States, five of which do better than two-thirds of the business. The Gillette-Wiley substitute does not provide for the elimination of oleo from the consumer and producer market. The Gillette-Wiley substitute is an attack upon monopolistic-administered prices and monopolistic production in behalf of the consumer and his welfare.

I wish to elaborate upon this point. The public policy of our Government has been for the establishment of what we call fair-trade standards, and the control, regulation, and elimination of monopolies. I recite as evidence the passage of the Sherman Antitrust Act, the Clayton Act, the Federal Trade Commission Act, the Pure Food and Drug Act, and the Robinson-Patman Act and the Miller-Tydings Fair Trade Law. The established public policy of the Congress of the United States is that of maintaining conditions of fair competition and standards of fair trade. Patent laws and copyrights are further evidence of the will of the Government to protect the channels of trade and the property rights of individuals.

It is a strange coincidence that the oleo bill comes before the United States Senate at the same time that an open attack is being launched upon the Federal Trade Commission, the Sherman Antitrust Act, and the Robinson-Patman Act. These are the bulwarks of free enterprise and the protectors of a competitive economy. Yes, Mr. President, the forces of monopoly in this country are diligently about their business to undermine a competitive business economy. In the process of doing this they appeal to the consumer, which is an old technique, an old game on the part of big business. The arguments we have heard in behalf of oleo are the same as the arguments which are being made throughout the country on the part of the cement industry and on the part of the steel industry, in their fight against the Federal Trade Commission and its rulings on the basing point. It is the same technique that is now being used by the A. & P. stores in their battle against the Antitrust Division of the Justice Department. Monopolistic big business has carried on a propaganda campaign that is attempting to mislead the American people into believing that bigness is to the best interests of the American consumer. To be sure, bigness within itself is not an evil. It even may be a necessity. But bigness that incorporates within itself a control over a market, control over prices, control over distribution, and ultimately control over the producer of the raw material is regimentation, is un-American, and is destructive of the individual property rights and economic liberties of the American citizen. The oleo interests are hand-in-glove with big steel, big cement, big oil and petroleum, and all the other corporate monopolies of this country. The evidence is here to support this conclusion.

Now the question we must ask ourselves on the issue of oleo, as on all issues that pertain to monopoly, is this: Will the short-run advantages of an administered, controlled, and regulated low price that is used to kill off competition be to the long-run interest of the American consumer?

In other words, are we to permit ever-growing concentration of economic power which buys its way into the market by discriminatory prices and all the other techniques of the trade, to destroy our competitive economic structure?

That is the issue. The issue is not the consumer. The consumer is protected by a good product. The consumer can buy butter, the consumer can buy oleo. He can buy colored oleo. The issue here is whether or not we are going to prevent, by the law of the land, a greater infringement of economic power.

Are we to permit 28 oleo companies to undermine the economic well-being of 2,500,000 dairy farmers and 3,500 creameries, and 40,000 local dairy processing plants? Are we to permit this with the approval of the Government of the United States when both political parties, the Republican and the Democratic, have stated again and again to the American people that monopoly is the enemy of a free economic system, and that monopoly is but the first step toward a regimented and controlled economy? Surely the consumers of America should not be misled into believing that there is any advantage, either in price, in quality, in efficiency of production and distribution, in monopolistic enterprise. The testimony before the Congress of the United States, the records in the Department of Justice and in the Trade Commission are filled with evidence that monopoly is not only conducive to inefficiency and high prices, but is a dangerous threat to the political and economic liberty of the American people.

This, Mr. President, is my case before the American people. The issue is clearly drawn. Are we to turn over another segment of the American economy to the cartels, to the monopolies, or are we to fulfill our pledges of democratic faith by preserving, through the law of the land, the conditions of competition and economic opportunity?

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum is present.

Mr. YOUNG obtained the floor.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. YOUNG. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. As one of the sponsors of the so-called Wiley-Gillette amendment, I intended to make some remarks outlining my position. But I have just received a letter from Mr. W. J. Knutzen, president of the Skagit County Dairymen's Association in my State, which so aptly and intelligently states the issues involved that I am going to refrain from making the remarks I had intended to make, and ask unanimous consent that Mr. Knutzen's letter be placed in the RECORD at this point, as expressing completely my views on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SKAGIT COUNTY DAIRYMEN'S ASSOCIATION,
Burlington, Wash., December 31, 1949.
Hon. WARREN G. MAGNUSON,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: When Congressman HENRY JACKSON was to be in Burlington last week, we left word to call us if you could be with him. We wanted to place our case on the yellow oleomargarine problem before you with all the details possible so that you would know how serious the problem has become. When the House passed H. R. 2023, the dairy industry started on a decline which will be given an added kick if you can't stop or kill it in the Senate. Since we could not meet you, we will do the best we can on paper. Of course, we realize you already know fully what the consequences are if H. R. 2023 passes and yellow oleo has free distribution.

At present, the Navy is selling yellow oleo right in our back yard at Whidbey Island. Why is the Government buying millions of pounds of butter and then selling yellow oleo to our armed forces?

In our own State, where yellow oleomargarine sales are illegal, we have a clean-up job on our hands. Many restaurants are still mixing butter and oleo for sandwich spreads, but we feel we can lick this one if our country does not allow national legal distribution of margarine colored yellow to imitate butter. On the other hand, if H. R. 2023 passes, it won't be long before we lose our law in this State against sale of yellow oleomargarine. There would simply be too much money spent by the vegetable-oil processors to compete with their propaganda.

Our national economy is threatened now. Dairying, combined with beef, is the largest single agricultural crop in this Nation. When 90 percent of veal and 40 percent of our beef comes from dairy herds, we shouldn't allow either imports of dairy products or infringement on dairy products such as yellow margarine. You know that 20,000,000 pounds of cheese is slated for import by the end of 1950. Five million pounds is already here—and at half the price of local cheese. That cheese will replace local cheese to the tune of 8,000,000 pounds of butter, which will have to be made, or we will just simply lose more cows.

Newspapers are carrying predictions (Babson) that milk production will be up in 1950. We heartily disagree with this prediction. Our factory shippers number 1,200 and our grade A shippers number only 315. We can see that some increase could take place in A grade milk in some parts of the Nation where they are short of bottling grade milk but we already have a surplus in almost every major market right in the middle of winter. We also point out that the factory shipper, if not given some protection, will fade from the picture. Secretary Brannan has just announced lower support prices for dairy products. Since these all affect the factory shipper, his immediate 1950 income will drop. That means a drop in national income, which in turn can be multiplied several times over the value of the raw materials. Transferring our butter business to a vegetable product is short-sighted economy even to the grower of those crops from which the vegetable oils and fats are derived. You know that concentrates fed to cows from that source aids in keeping comparatively low vegetable oils and fats selling prices so they can compete with imported fats and oils. By eliminating the dairy herds, this concentrate market will be lost and imported oils will replace local products in our opinion.

From your statements to us, we know that you are as conversant with these problems as we are. However, you may need support in backing up your stand by additional testimony and we want you to know that we are willing to carry out any plan by which you will be supplied with this material. That House bill 2023 is a menace of the first order to us. We do hope you can kill it in the Senate.

Sincerely,

W. J. KNUTZEN,
President.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, I wish to speak in opposition to House bill 2023, the bill sponsored by the able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT]. Passage of the Fulbright bill in its present form would do a grave injustice to the 2,500,000 dairy farmers in the United States and also, in my opinion, to the great consuming American public.

The dairy farmers, while they believe they are entitled to the protection they have had for years through the tax which has been applied to oleomargarine, are perfectly willing that these taxes be repealed allowing oleomargarine to be sold subject to the laws in the various States. At the same time, they believe, and justly so, that they must have protection against fraud and imitation of their product which has been recognized as one of the most essential foods of all families for centuries.

After talking with consumers in almost every walk of life, I find that they, too, want at least some protection. They want to know, for example, when they are making purchases in markets of dairy products, whether or not the product they are buying is a real dairy product or an imitation. The millions who eat 65,000,000 meals a day in restaurants and cafes, too, want to know what kind of butter is being served them, whether it be real dairy butter or a substitute.

It is regrettable that manufacturers of margarine have seen fit in recent years so to label their product that the average consumer does not know which product he is buying. For example, many margarine products are being sold on the market with a picture of a dairy farm on the package, or advertised with such phrases as "freshly churned" or "country sweet," or labeled in other ways to indicate that they may be real dairy butter when in fact they are only substitute products.

It is this fraudulent method of selling a substitute product which dairy farmers are violently opposed to and have every right to be. It is my opinion that many hundreds of thousands of consumers have been eating margarine in recent years believing, because of the label on the package which implied it was dairy butter, that it actually was. The dairy industry asks only for such regulations of substitutes as may be necessary to protect the producers and consumers. Butter can be identified at sight only by its naturally yellow color. Whenever vegetable-oil food products are readily identifiable by taste or appearance, consumers will judge by their purchases between the products. This is not possible when a product such as margarine is colored the same as dairy butter and every conceivable method used to even label the package to deceive the public.

Why, in the name of common sense, cannot margarine stand on its own merits, if it is as good a product as its manufacturers would have us believe? Oleo has been allowed to imitate the flavor of butter. It may use preservatives, denied to butter. It is fortified to imitate the nutritional qualities of butter. It imitates butter wrapping and butter packaging. Dairy farmers are fully aware that this has gone a long way to destroy the sales of their own product. It has gone a long way to destroy one of the greatest industries in America. In Canada, in a single year of legalized oleo, Canadian dairy farmers have lost $50,000,000 in butter sales, according to the president of the National Dairy Council.

Mr. President, it appears to be possible that the food requirements of our Nation could be supplied largely by artificial products similar to oleomargarine. Germany, previous to World War II and during the war, of necessity, had to resort to that means. I am told that a large part of both their food and clothing was provided through artificial methods; both food and clothing, for example, being produced in large quantities from coal and wood pulp. I shudder to think what would happen to our economy here in the United States if we applied that philosophy. It would mean a bankrupt agriculture and eventually a bankrupt Nation.

How far and fast we can safely move in the direction of substitute foods, displacing purely agricultural products, is a question that ought to receive serious consideration. At one time approximately one-half the population of the United States was engaged in agriculture. At the present time, approximately 18 percent only of our total population is engaged in farming.

The complete substitution of dairy butter in the market places by oleomargarine would be another step in that direction and would do untold injury to our whole farming economy. Presently, there are approximately 2,500,000 of our farmers engaged in dairying. If our butter markets are to be lost or the price demoralized, a large part of this 2,500,000 people would, of necessity, have to engage in other types of farming or move into the cities, seeking employment in an employment market that is already well supplied.

I wish to point out, too, Mr. President, that in the field of agriculture we have plenty of economic problems. Farm prices have generally declined as much as 50 percent and more in the last 2 years. This decrease in farm income is already being felt in our national economy, and primarily through reduced farm purchasing power and lowered income-tax returns. The future outlook for agriculture is far from bright, and here we have on the Senate floor today the oleomargarine bill which, if passed, would deal another severe blow to agriculture.

If this oleomargarine bill should become a law, as I have pointed out, great numbers of American farmers would have to convert their farms to another type of agriculture. It is obvious that there is little opportunity in this direction. Our farmers are already required to reduce their wheat acreage by 25 percent and more. Cotton, corn, and almost every other type of farming is facing like curtailed production programs if we are to maintain even a meager minimum price for agricultural products.

Even while the problems of agriculture increase day by day, we are importing great quantities of agricultural products. There are a few astounding examples. While our production of rye in the United States is almost at a record low, we have imported in the past 6 months more than twice as much as we have exported. This at a time when markets were available to us in Austria, Germany, and other countries, if the administration would only see fit to take advantage of them. About a year and a half ago, we gave England, through ECA, $354,000,000 to purchase wheat in Canada. Approximately 6 months ago, through ECA, the United States again furnished $175,000,000 to England for the purchase of wheat in Canada. In effect, this gave the Canadian farmers a better farm price support program than that enjoyed by United States farmers. The Canadians, as a result, face no acreage-reduction program as do our farmers.

We have imported many other farm products that could well be produced in the United States. Some of these importation programs could well be carried to extremes, as is, in my opinion, the margarine question now before us. Imports of sugar supplied 48.7 percent of our United States needs in 1949. If protective tariffs of roughly 10 percent were lowered, or completely abolished, of course the American consumers could buy sugar cheaper, but it is admitted by the majority of this Congress that this would be an unwise policy.

There is a great similarity between the problem of the United States dairy interests and the United States sugar producers. Both need protection. In the case of the dairy interests, the producers are willing to go much further than are the sugar producers in that they are willing to eliminate the protective taxes and ask only that it be substituted by the Wiley-Gillette bill, which would provide a protection against the infringement in their market by substitutes in a fraudulent manner.

Mr. President, many argue that we must not stop progress in any direction; that we must allow cheaper foods to reach our markets, regardless of the consequences to our producers. We have pursued this course much too far already. If we keep moving further in that direction, we shall find ourselves in the same position we were in during that disastrous period for agriculture from 1930 to 1940. During that period, every State in the Midwest, the greatest farm area in the United States, if not in the world, lost large percentages of their population. These farmers, during that period, moved to the cities on the west coast and east coast of the United States, seeking employment when there was little to be had. In North Dakota at that time we lost 18 percent of our population, and even to this day have not regained the total amount of population enjoyed in 1930. Most other agricultural areas are in a similar position.

This population shift was made necessary because there was not a single phase of agriculture which was profitable in that era. Iowa, one of the most fertile agricultural States of all, suffered just as severely, if not more so, than other States during that period.

What I am trying to point out, Mr. President, is the great need at this particular time to protect all segments of our agriculture if we are to prevent another depression far more disastrous than was the past one.

Mr. President, in the bill now before the Senate, the farmers directly affected are the dairy farmers, cotton farmers, and soybean farmers.

The dairy and cotton farmers have long been established in the United States, and both have contributed much to the building of the Nation's commerce and economy. Cotton, however, is grown principally for its fiber. Cottonseed oil is a byproduct. Milk, on the other hand, is the only product of the cow, and its only use of any importance is for food. About 27 percent of all our milk is manufactured into butter, the form in which it may best be stored and shipped.

Cotton farming depletes the fertility of the soil, while dairy farming builds it up. Sections of the country which have pursued cotton farming for long periods have found it desirable to introduce dairying as a method of diversification and to build up the soil. Much time and effort have been expended in many communities, not only in the South but elsewhere, by businessmen, bankers, and civic clubs to foster dairy farming as an important factor in improving agriculture. Dairy farmers furnish a large market for cottonseed cake, which is a byproduct of cotton farming, and which brings the cotton farmer more money than he gets for cottonseed oil used in oleo.

Any policy that results in replacement of butter by oleomargarine will result in a decrease in dairying, a decrease in the cotton farmers' market for cottonseed cake, and an increase in his cost for fertilizer.

Soybean oil does not make as good a quality of oleomargarine as does cottonseed oil. There are so many diversified markets for soybeans and for soybean oil that it is not necessary for them to find a market by invading the dairy field.

Nothing is gained by the Nation if one element in our agriculture is to be built up only by tearing down another.

In my own State of North Dakota sales of dairy products account for 6 percent of our total farm income. Sales of North Dakota farm products used in oleomargarine account for only five one-thousandths of 1 percent of the State's total farm income. More than 92 percent of all the milk sold in North Dakota goes into butter. There is no metropolitan market that could absorb the fluid milk produced in North Dakota and many of its surrounding States, if butter markets are handed over to oleo.

Diversified farming, of which dairy farming is one of the most important single elements, is essential in soybean-growing areas and in cotton areas.

Mr. President, great soil conservation authorities have spoken from time to time on the role that dairy farming plays in conservation of the soil. I wish to quote here briefly from one of the most eminent world authorities on the question of soil conservation, Dr. H. H. Bennett, Chief of the United States Soil Conservation Service:

> Few, if any, other kinds of farms respond more promptly and satisfactorily to soil and water conservation, cropping, and pasture-management measures than does dairy farming.

O. E. Reed, Chief of the Bureau of Dairy Industry, United States Department of Agriculture, says:

> No farmer has a better opportunity to keep his farm land in a high state of fertility and productiveness than the man who markets his crop through good dairy cows.

We would do well here today to heed the warning of Dr. Bennett, Mr. Reed, and others on this all-important subject of soil conservation.

Mr. President, we are wisely spending hundreds of millions of dollars annually on soil-conserving programs. This program not only should be continued but greatly accelerated if we are to avoid the tragedy of other once great nations of the world which failed to recognize this great need. The dairy farmer conserves his soil without Federal subsidies, by returning to the land much of what he takes from it. Destruction of our dairy industry through legislation such as is now pending before the Senate would in a large measure nullify much of our laudible efforts toward better conservation of our greatest asset of all—our soil fertility.

History demonstrates that the leading nations of the world are and have been those which consume the greatest quantities of dairy products.

The progress made in recent years, in which oleomargarine has gained a large part of the butter market, has encouraged the vegetable-oil people to make inroads into the market for other dairy products. Vegetable oils have been substituted for butterfat in ice cream. Vegetable oils have been substituted for butterfat in evaporated milk.

The Fulbright bill, if it became a law, would open the door to more and more substitution in these vitally important food products. While cotton farmers, through greater use of cottonseed in the manufacture of oleomargarine, temporarily benefit, it would, in my opinion, only be a short time until cheaper foreign oils would take the place of cottonseed.

The total per capita consumption of fats in the United States remains about constant, so an increase in consumption of vegetable fats results in decreased consumption of dairy products. The nutritionists agree that our national consumption of dairy products should be greatly increased for the well-being of our people. There is ample market for vegetable oils in the forms of shortenings, cooking compounds, salad oils, and industrial products. That is, if we can prevent the importation of these from other parts of the world, which can produce far more cheaply with low-price labor.

Mr. President, undoubtedly the passage of the Fulbright bill would give a temporary advantage, small though I am sure it would be, to cotton producers.

There will be little, if any, advantage to the consumers of the United States. Most of the production of oleomargarine is in the hands of a very few tremendously large corporations whose records do not indicate that they are willing to pass on much, if any, of their savings to the consumers by way of lower prices for oleomargarine.

In my opinion, if the Fulbright bill should pass, the consumers in the future would be paying even more for this product. It would go a long way toward destroying the economy of two and one-half million small dairy farmers.

I sincerely hope that the Wiley-Gillette substitute will be approved. This substitute, while not all that dairy farmers would like and are entitled to, will in some measure protect the great dairy interests of this Nation.

I add in closing, Mr. President, that I know of no other subject which is closer to the hearts of the dairy farmers than is the bill now pending before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHOEPPEL in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY].

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, in studying the issue that is before us today I hope we may all realize that the importance of the action we take may run far beyond the direct interests of the butter and oleomargarine producers. We are discussing a proposal that the Federal Government should facilitate an effort by one industry—the oleomargarine industry—to persuade the American public to use a highly refined, processed, and synthetic product as a substitute for natural butter. We are doing more than that. We are encouraging the oleomargarine industry to tailor its product as to color, taste, smell, size, and in every other way exactly like butter, so that the consumer will not be able to tell whether it is butter or not unless he looks at the label, and unless the label is honest.

I recall that a few days ago the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] spoke of artificial leather as a substitute for natural leather, rayon as a substitute for cotton, and referred to other similar imitations. At least none of those products went into the human stomach. I realize that we live in an age of synthetics, but I do not believe that we ought to try to fill the needs of the human stomach with synthetics when the original product of nature is still plentiful. I believe we should at least exempt the human biology from this invasion of additional substitutes. Furthermore, I believe that if we accept the pending measure we may set a precedent which will make it difficult to reject any other product which may be subsequently developed as a substitute for any other natural food.

Mr. President, there is vastly more to this oleomargarine-dairy controversy than meets the eye at first blush. Many aspects of the problem are well known to us, and to a large segment of the general public as well. There are some, of course, who have been swayed in their evaluation of the issue by the high-pressure propaganda tactics employed so ingeniously by the oleomargarine industry's high-salaried, high-powered lobbying, publicity and advertising staffs. There are still others whose selfish personal interests blind them to the real factors involved in this case. But no one with even the sketchiest knowledge of our delicately balanced farm economy denies that a monopoly by the powerful oleomargarine trust of the American table-spread market would bring economic chaos to our 2,500,000 dairy farmers. Anyone with even the most superficial comprehension of this Nation's economic history readily concedes that the butter market is the inexpendable balance wheel of our great dairy industry, and that our vital dairy industry is the inexpendable stabilizer of our entire agricultural economy. For it is a truism among economists that every major depression we have suffered in this country started in agriculture. And currently declining dairy prices indicate that the dairy industry is already on the brink of a real recession.

Mr. President, from the standpoint of the dairyman, the effect of this bill would be to permit oleomargarine to invade the market for butter and destroy that market for the butter producer and the producer of dairy products. That is the sum and substance of it. That apparently is the purpose of some of the sponsors of it. That is the reason why some of us who are familiar with the problems of the farmer are against it.

ENDANGERS SOIL CONSERVATION

No informed person will question the prediction that dairy farmers in every part of this Nation, if confronted with the loss of the butter market, the only equitable outlet they have for 27 percent of their total milk production, would be compelled to slaughter millions of dairy cows virtually overnight. Moreover, Mr. President, in this respect, agronomists and farm experts generally concur that loss of such large numbers of dairy cattle would strike a fatal blow at the very taproots of our national soil-conservation program. This is so because these dairy animals, which perform such a miraculous cycle of efficiency in the course of their existence, contribute to our good earth the very essence of fertility; the fertility for which this Nation is justly famous the world over; fertility that provides us with most of the basic foods to preserve the health and energies of the people of this Nation, and of the people of numerous other nations less fortunate and farseeing than we. In this connection, I urge this body to consider nations such as China, India, and Africa, which have neglected the cultivation of their soil, which have devaluated their dairy industry and failed to practice animal husbandry. Then compare those countries with Denmark, Switzerland, Sweden, Holland, and the other agriculture-conscious nations. In the first group we find people who are undernourished, impoverished, and disconsolate. While in the other group we find well-fed, well-clothed, prosperous healthy, happy people. I say, therefore, that men of vision will not fly in the face of fate by permitting the oleomargarine trust to doom our historically vital dairy industry, which provides our two most nearly perfect foods—meat and milk—foods indispensable to an adequate diet for every man, woman, and child in America.

MEAT AND DAIRY PRICES WOULD SKYROCKET

By the same token, Mr. President, no Member of this body who has perused the records of past hearings on the oleomargarine issue can rationally refute the documented statements of reputable farm experts who contend that the slaughter of millions of dairy cows will eventually result in an unprecedented scarcity of beef, and veal, and milk, and cream, and cheese. They further predict that such an eventuality would skyrocket the prices of these essential foods, and of all other dairy products as well. This condition would be inevitable since, apart from milk, 40 percent of the Nation's supply of beef and veal is derived from our dairy cows. Consequently, a full-scale massacre of dairy cattle would naturally greatly reduce the reproductive source of calves and the cycle of perpetuation would thus be appreciably narrowed.

PERFECT IMITATION OF BUTTER INSURES OLEO MONOPOLY

Some misinformed individuals have questioned the contention that bankruptcy would befall the dairy farmers of this Nation if the 28 oleo corporations were to capture the butter market. Some have been bold enough to express doubt that oleomargarine, colored yellow in exact imitation of butter, could capture the butter market. But how can anyone doubt this, when the synthetic product, oleomargarine, would then not only smell and taste like butter, but would also look exactly like butter?

The fact remains, Mr. President, that we have only to examine the evidence inserted in the records of the hearings to realize how easily such a monopoly could be engineered. One has only to know that 5 of the 28 oleomargarine corporations in this country manufacture 68.4 percent of all of the oleomargarine used in the United States. Furthermore, 40 percent of the world's total consumption of oleomargarine is manufactured by a single company, the giant Unilever empire, which is the parent European company of Lever Bros. This is not rumor, Mr. President. Cables received from the special services division of International News Service, who conducted an objective survey of Unilever, Ltd., of London, were entered in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. These cables reported that Charles Luckman, president of Lever Bros Co., had stated in London that the John Jelke Co. of Chicago, purchased recently by Lever Bros., would ultimately expand its operations to all of the 48 States, and that Lever Bros. planned to build oleomargarine plants on both the east and west coasts. Certainly this leaves little to the imagination concerning Mr. Luckman's and Lever Bros.' and Unilever, Ltd.'s aspirations in the United States of America.

FRAUD INEVITABLE

Those of this body who have examined the official records of the oleomargarine hearings know also that an investigation conducted recently in the State of Arkansas, revealed that 66 out of 100 restaurants in that State were illegally serving oleomargarine colored yellow in exact imitation of real butter. The most pertinent and enlightening facet of this investigation, however, is the startling fact that Arkansas has an oleomargarine law in effect which is virtually identical to the oleomargarine measure now awaiting action by this body. The Arkansas law permits the serving of yellow oleomargarine in restaurants, provided customers are informed of the substitution by posted signs and by mention in menus. Nevertheless, 66 percent of the restaurants investigated were serving yellow oleo illegally, and not 1 of the 100 restaurants displayed a sign of any kind concerning the substitution, or made any mention in their menus of the switch. To fully appreciate the import of this comparatively limited investigation, this body must consider that Americans eat 65,000,000 restaurant meals every day in the year.

ENFORCEMENT INFEASIBLE AND COSTLY

Some may argue that the solution to this fraudulent use of yellow oleo is rigid enforcement. In answer to that, let me say, Mr. President, the Bureau of the Budget and the Pure Food and Drug Administration have estimated that it would cost the taxpayers five to six million dollars annually, and would require employment of a minimum of 950 additional Federal agents, to make only a single check each year of every restaurant in this country. They concede, however, effective enforcement could not be achieved with less than one inspection each month. Simple arithmetic tells us, then, that this would involve an expenditure of $60,000,000 annually and employment of 11,450 additional Federal agents. But even then we would have no assurance that the very lucrative yellow oleo fraud could be controlled.

FRAUD WOULD NOT END IN RESTAURANTS

There is still another fraud possibility to examine. The profit on a pound of oleo is approximately 3 cents and the profit on a pound of butter is a quarter of a cent. It would, therefore, not astonish students of human nature if thousands of unscrupulous tradespeople were to palm off yellow oleomargarine as butter. In fact, testimony before the House and Senate committees showed that unskilled persons are able to switch a pound of oleomargarine from a 1-pound oleo carton to a 1-pound butter carton in a little more than 1 minute.

GLUT OF ERSATZ FOODS MIGHT INJURE PUBLIC HEALTH

Mr. President, while I realize that the points I have made thus far are known to you and to this body, I was impelled to reiterate them as a preface to my major concern in this issue. I am coming now to that imperative matter. I am intensely concerned lest we pass legislation here which would tend to establish a dangerous precedent for the indiscriminate sale of synthetic foods to the people of America. I am deeply fearful lest America's markets be deluged and glutted with ersatz milk and meat and cheese and an unending procession of artificial, substitute, inorganic foods such as those that were developed in Hitler's Reich. I am doing considerable research on this subject, and I shall subsequently submit here scientific data which have convinced me that the wholesomeness of these chemical food substitutes is, to say the least, questionable. And I shall also show that many of these inorganic foods already exist.

GERMANY DEVELOPING SYNTHETIC FOODS

Mr. President, allow me to prove that the fear I express here is not an alarmist's hysteria—not the figment of an unbridled imagination. Only recently the New York Times reported that two food substitutes had been developed in Frankfurt, Germany, where scientists had attested to the fact that the products tasted like and had the same nutritious qualities as milk and meat.

Another reliable report, which was submitted in testimony before the subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of this body during the Seventy-eighth Congress, stated that a method had been developed in Germany for the manufacture of fatty acids, soaps, and edible fats from petroleum paraffin and from a byproduct of Germany's synthetic gasoline plants.

Actually, during 1937, a factory was erected in Germany for the manufacture of artificial fatty acids and synthetic fatty acids were produced from coal. At that time the Public Health Bureau of the Reich, under the leadership of a certain professor, Dr. Flossner, claimed to have demonstrated what he termed the "high value of synthetic edible fats" after making several experiments. He then released these fats to the public with the statement: "These are the first synthetic food materials in the world for human nourishment." Also in Germany, the first full-scale plant for the manufacture of edible fats was erected. This edible fat was prepared in a mulsified form as what was called synthetic butter.

FILLED MILK ACT EFFECTIVE

I tell you, Mr. President, that I am deeply disturbed and earnestly fearful that a precedent for the development of such food substitutes might be established in this country. It would seem that Members of the Sixty-seventh Congress in 1923 were assailed by the same fear which now assails me, when they saw fit to pass the Filled Milk Act, to regulate the sale of that synthetic-milk product, which is a combination of vegetable oils and skim milk, to imitate evaporated milk. The Filled Milk Act has proved successful in regulating the sale and manufacture of imitation evaporated milk. But who can say what might have happened to our great dairy industry and perhaps even to the public health had the Congress failed to anticipate the grave potentialities inherent in the uncontrolled sale of an ersatz milk on the American market.

I am unalterably opposed to having every new synthesis compounded by chemists introduced into the food stream of this Nation. I am fearful—and I am not alone in this, for a great many distinguished scientists agree—I am fearful of the deleterious effect which such a synthetic diet might ultimately have upon the systems of every man, woman, and child in this country.

MEDICAL MEN QUESTION MODERN FOOD-PROCESSING METHODS

Mr. President, Members of this body may recall that not too long ago a group of distinguished medical men, among them pediatricians, nutritionists, biochemists, and professors of medicine, signed and submitted to the Food and Drug Administration a resolution in the name of the Council of Foods and Nutrition of the American Medical Association. This resolution pertained to the establishment of standards for bread and related products. The outstanding aggregation of medical men who signed the resolution included such celebrated personages as Dr. Morris Fishbein, editor of the Journal of the American Medical Association; Dr. Philip C. Jeans, professor of pediatrics of the University of Iowa School of Medicine; Dr. James Wilson, secretary of the Council of Foods and Nutrition of the AMA; Dr. George R. Cogwill, professor of nutrition at Yale University School of Medicine; Dr. C. A. Elvehjem, professor of biochemistry of the University of Wisconsin and who is generally regarded as one of the Nation's great biochemists; Dr. Russell M. Wilder, chief of medicine at the Mayo Clinic; Dr. Howard B. Lewis, of the department of biological chemistry, University of Michigan; Dr. John B. Youmans, formerly professor of medicine at Vanderbilt University School of Medicine; these and other distinguished gentlemen of the world of science and of the medical profession, who have investigated the subject of chemical food substitutes in relation to the public health, signed the resolution. I should like at this time to read several excerpts from their resolution:

> An increasing proportion of the Nation's food supply is subjected to industrial processing. Accordingly, alterations in processing techniques may have a direct bearing on the quality of the national diet and health. * * *
> At the present * * * there is being introduced a new processing practice which the council views with considerable apprehension—namely, the widespread addition of certain surface-active compounds (shortening extenders) to a variety of foods, especially bread and other bakery products. * * *
> They are added to foodstuffs during processing in order to aid emuisification. Their use allows the production of a smooth-textured product, often of superior sales appeal, which contains less fat than one made without the extender. In some instances the addition of the agent also permits the lowering of the proportions of other important food ingredients in the product—for example, the use in bread imparts similar properties of freshness as does the use of nonfat milk solids.

Mr. President, I realize it may appear that some of these data have no specific bearing upon the issue we are debating. However, it is all a part of the trend to substitute chemistry for nature. And I am trying to prove that this body cannot afford to promulgate any law which might ultimately become the means of encouraging our successors or our colleagues, in the years ahead, to predicate other, similar laws upon our ill-advised conclusions—conclusions not formed in the public interest. Toward forestalling such determinations I must give you all the facts at my disposal.

SYNTHETIC FATS STILL UNFIT FOR HUMANS

I can give authenticated facts, Mr. President, relating to potential, chemically produced oleomargarine which follow the same line as the facts I have submitted concerning new processes in the manufacture of bread. For example, in March of 1949 the Nutrition Division of the Food and Agricultural Organization of the United Nations issued a booklet on synthetic fats entitled, "Synthetic Fats, Their Potential Contribution to World Food Requirement." Contained in this booklet is a complete story of the development of synthetic fats to take the place of organic foods. In tracing the possibilities that might arise, the booklet has this to say about synthetic margarines:

No final conclusion on the nutritional value of synthetic fats can be drawn at the present time. The available information emphasized the need for further experimental work.

It would, however, clearly be premature to advocate the large-scale manufacture of synthetic fats for human consumption, pending the collection of more complete and satisfactory experimental and clinical data.

That is a striking example of the point I am debating here. That is a definite indication of what can happen when genii of chemistry set to work to substitute their alchemy for organic fats and oils or any of nature's foodstuffs. Observe their admitted uncertainty as to the final results of this development. Their indecisiveness is patently obvious when they say:

It would, however, clearly be premature to advocate the large-scale manufacture of synthetic fats for human consumption.

Mr. President, I do not wish to make a nuisance of myself through unnecessary repetition, but I must say again that my principal concern in this issue is for the health of the people of America. This body will agree that thus far all the evidence I have presented indicates that science has only a fragmentary knowledge of the effect of these inorganic, synthetic foods upon the human system. Nevertheless, I contend that if we permit oleomargarine to masquerade in the guise of real creamery butter, by passing legislation to legalize the movement of yellow oleomargarine in interstate commerce, we shall be opening the road for an interminable stream of these unproven, laboratory-conceived, chemically concocted inorganic foods.

FRAUD LATENT IN SYNTHETIC-FOOD DISTRIBUTION

Let me go back for a moment to the German report, referred to previously, which appeared in the New York Times. A spokesman, in Germany, in announcing the advent of the chemical food substitutes which had been developed there by a group of Allied and German scientists, stated:

This is potentially the greatest innovation in human feeding since people began to cook. This is a big statement, but it is true. These synthetic foods can be a boon not only to the people of Germany but to hungry areas throughout the world. They are cheap and could be useful in the United States too.

The synthetic foods that this spokesman referred to consist of a combination of protein extracts from such diverse sources as soybeans, peanuts, wood, wheat, corn, and even coal. The synthetic milk produced by this group of scientists is already being distributed in German rations.

The synthetic meat is actually a mixture of 50 percent ordinary meat and 50 percent vegetable proteins. It is prepared in the form of sausages, such as liverwurst and salami. Those two products have also gone on the market in Germany. There was a third synthetic food which they attempted to produce: a 100-percent vegetable protein, but it was rejected because it was not thought to be palatable enough. However, the spokesman stated that experiments were continuing. He said—and there is a fine analogy to be drawn from this:

We can even produce a "roast beef" so that you would not know the difference from the real thing.

SYNTHETIC FOOD "CAPSULES" A POSSIBILITY

That, Mr. President, is precisely what the oleomargarine manufacturers are attempting to do in relation to butter. They are trying to make oleomargarine look and taste so much like butter that you would not know the difference from the real thing. Yes, and that is the paramount evil which this body must nip in the bud now, or else be prepared to see the dairy cow put out of business and our great dairy industry doomed. Then, before too long, we would see synthetic "roast beef," chemical vegetables, ersatz steak, bread and butter, all concocted in chemical laboratories, and piped to the dinner tables of the people of America. Nor is it impossible to conceive that in the course of time these same test-tube geniuses will develop inorganic foods synthesized to a point where perhaps all we shall have to do to be thoroughly nourished, even satiated, will be to gulp a minute capsule, followed by a short sip of water. But I dread to think what would be the effect upon our public health if we had to subsist on this unnatural, man-made chemical diet, from the cradle to the grave.

MEAT INSTITUTE OFFICIAL REPLIES

In this connection, Mr. President, I should like to read to you a short statement made by Wesley Hardenbergh, which some people are apt to regard as biased, since the gentleman is affiliated with the American Meat Institute. Nevertheless, Mr. Hardenbergh made this statement in reply to the report I have just read to you concerning the development of synthetic foods in Germany. Said Mr. Hardenbergh:

This is another of the long series of discoveries as to how people can get the nutrition of meat from a pill, a capsule, the end result of some chemical process, field crops grown for farm animals, minute animal life that swims in the sea, protein derived from sawdust, a combination of powdered vegetables, and so on.

For example, the flavor of meat does not come from monosodiumglutamate. This product is supposed to enhance the flavor of various foods.

For another example, the statement is made that all protein is alike. This emphatically is not true. There are two kinds of protein—complete and incomplete. Meat is a complete protein food.

NO PROOF SYNTHETIC FOODS HARMLESS TO MAN

This statement, regardless of its source, makes sound sense to me. The recurring, blatant fact which unceasingly continues to disturb me is that everywhere I seek information, every avenue and channel of research I pursue, fails to disclose a single scrap of conclusive evidence that these artificially conceived and artificially produced foods if consumed over long periods of time would not be deleterious to human beings. I have discovered innumerable references and statements by chemists, biochemists, nutritionists, doctors, and scientists relating to experiments with synthetized, artificially produced foods on rats, rabbits, and other animals. But not a single word can I find that unconditionally attests to the harmlessness of these synthetic products to man.

LAWMAKERS CANNOT AFFORD TO BE CASUAL

It is true that several toxicologists and nutritionists recently testified before the Food and Drug Administration in support of certain manufacturers' claims that their products were harmless. Bear in mind, however, that these witnesses were brought there by the manufacturers of the products then under scrutiny. You may also recollect that many unexplainable irregularities—involving the deaths of rats, dogs, and other animals who had been fed the substitute foods then under discussion—were revealed at these hearings by the representatives of the Food and Drug Administration. One doctor of medicine on the pay roll of the Atlas Powder Co. testified to the effect that in the course of experiments quantities of the Atlas Co.'s chemicals had been fed to some 60 medical students for the period of a month, and that a large segment of these students reported manifestations of diarrhea, belching, pruritis, itching, and other symptoms. When I read that testimony, Mr. President, the thing that impressed me most forcibly—and I know it must have similarly impressed some of my colleagues in this body—was the casual manner in which the witness, after having made the admissions I have just described, dispensed with the subject by simply stating that all the so-called side effects disappeared after the first 2 weeks of feeding.

FOOD LAWS LACK TEETH

I believe most strongly that we would be criminally negligent in our sworn duty were we to emulate that complacency. Conversely, perhaps we should adopt as our catechism the statement made by Dr. R. M. Wilder, professor of medicine of the Mayo Clinic, in Rochester, Minn. This distinguished medical professor made the following comment during a speech before the National Nutrition Conference in this very city, in May of 1941:

The machinery for Government regulation of foods was devised to prevent the sale of spoiled, adulterated, or misbranded foods. With notable exceptions in certain bureaus of the Department of Agriculture, little attention has been given to the nutritive qualities of human foods. The interest in general has been more in protecting pocketbooks than health. Also unhappily some food legislation has discriminated in favor of special interest groups with large political influence to the detriment of the public at large.

DAIRY FARMERS DO NOT SEEK TO RETARD WHITE OLEO TRADE

Mr. President, it would perhaps be apropos at this time to remind this body that the dairy farmers are not in the least concerned about fair competition with the oleomargarine industry. In fact, the dairy industry has no desire to suppress the sale of oleomargarine in its natural, white, form—the most economical form in which the public can purchase the product. Consequently it can be stated here that the dairy industry—the farmers and those of us who are supporting and cosponsoring the Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment—coincide in our desire to protect the pocketbooks as well as the physical well-being of the people of America, for it must be borne in mind that if we were to legalize the manufacture and sale of yellow oleomargarine, we would be dooming the so-called poor man's spread. This would be a virtual certainty simply because when the oleomargarine manufacturers no longer had to compete against their own white product, the poor man's spread—white oleomargine—would disappear from the market. The Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment also seeks to protect the public health by refusing to sanction a national law which would permit 28 oleomargarine corporations to imitate exactly an admittedly superior product. However, I am not here to debate whether butter is more wholesome or less wholesome than oleomargarine. I repeat, my ultimate concern and contention is that regardless of comparative nutritive values, oleomargarine should not be permitted to camouflage itself so perfectly as butter that in being permitted legally to do so, we throw open the legislative flood gates and allow a deluge of experimental, synthetic, possibly harmful chemical foods to descend upon the market places of this Nation.

FURTHER PROOF OF SCIENTISTS' UNCERTAINTY ABOUT SYNTHETIC FATS

Mr. President, I should like to further substantiate my claim that the scientists are exceedingly dubious as to the effects of synthetic foods upon human beings. I should like to quote a brief excerpt from a letter signed by Dr. F. H. Rein, of Goettingen, Germany. Dr. Rein, who is associated with the Physiological Institute of the University of Goettingen, writes:

> In the method of hydrogenation of coal according to Fischer-Tropsch for the purpose of gasoline synthesis, the so-called paraffin-gatsch is obtained as a byproduct.

"Gatsch," as referred to by Dr. Rein, is a byproduct of the carbon monoxide hydrogenation process originated in Germany under Hitler, which I have already commented upon.

> It is possible to obtain fatty acids through oxidation of the paraffin contained therein. These fatty acids were esterified with glycerine and in this manner a "fat" was produced, which during the war, to a small extent, was given to the German population and to the German Army as an edible fat. Neither severe sicknesses nor death occurred from this; but only because the amounts consumed had been too small and the period of feeding had been too short. Otherwise, this attempt to use synthetic edible fats could have done great harm.

EXPERTS CITE DEFICIENCIES IN OLEO

Some idea of how the scientists, nutritionists, toxicologists, and biologists regard the comparative virtues of butter and present-day oleomargarine may be had from several statements which I have taken from various authoritative sources. T. B. Osborne and L. B. Mendel, in their joint paper "The Influence of Butterfat on Growth," state in part:

> Little has been said in the past of the vitamin E content of butter, but it appears to be present in significant quantities. On a diet in which all vitamin-E-containing substances, except butter, were removed, test animals continued to reproduce and did not otherwise exhibit symptoms of vitamin E deficiency. The removal of butter from the diet, however, saw the cessation of all reproductive powers. The presence of butter in the diet of persons receiving no other supply of vitamin E, when furnished in amounts up to 10 percent, assures not only reasonable success in reproduction, but is followed by notable success in lactation.

E. J. Schantz, C. A. Elvehjem, and E. D. Hart go even farther along this line in their collaboration in Dairy Science. They state:

> [There is a] need for butterfat, if reproduction powers are to remain normal.

On the other hand, let us observe what the same experts have to say on the same subject in relation to oleomargarine. Schantz, Elvehjem, and Hart write:

> The nutritional inferiority of butter substitutes is reflected in their inability to promote growth, or even sustain reproduction in test animals. A series of animal tests placed half the rats on a diet including vegetable oils, and the other half received a diet in which the vegetable oils were replaced with butter. The group on vegetable oils had a lower growth rate. They also tended to have a lower birth rate, and produced unsatisfactory offspring. A third group was placed on a diet which excluded butter, and their weight slumped one-third. The replacement of milk and butter in the diet promptly returned their weight to normal.

EVEN A LEGALIZED SYNTHETIC PRODUCE MAY BE HARMFUL

Mr. President, I said I was not here to debate the comparative nutritive values of butter and oleomargarine. That is true. The comparisons I have just made are not submitted here in an effort to prejudice the minds of Members of this body against oleomargarine as a food, or to imply that oleomargarine is not a wholesome product. I have submitted these comparisons solely in an endeavor to show that some scientists and food experts harbor grave doubts concerning the wholesomeness or harmfulness even of a synthetic produce which already has the official blessing of our Food and Drug Administration, and which is being consumed this very day by millions of men, women, and children here and abroad. Yet, I could produce scores of similar statements which reflect this wavering indetermination in the scientific and near-scientific worlds concerning the wholesomeness of oleomargarine.

ASSEMBLY LINE OF SYNTHETICS WOULD DISPLACE REAL FOODS

I do not want this body to lose track of my determined objection to the coloration of oleomargarine in exact imitation of real butter. That unalterable objection is founded upon a terrible dread that national legalization of yellow oleomargarine would inevitably be the forerunner of an interminable assembly line of only partially proven synthetic foods of every conceivable variety. Nor do I hesitate to predict here that if we lower the legal bars and permit oleomargarine to further disguise itself as butter we shall live to see the tragic usurpation of our great national storehouse of natural foods by ingeniously chemicalized syntheses of every God-given food from fish to fowl. It is with this potentiality in mind that I beseech this body to ponder carefully and soberly the cataclysmic economic repercussions which would unquestionably result from the displacement of millions of pounds of real fish and meat and vegetables and eggs and milk and a legion of other real, basic foods—displacement by artificial, conglomerate mixtures such as those produced in Frankfort, Germany.

CHEMISTS SEEMINGLY AS DUBIOUS AS DOCTORS

Senators have heard me quote several statements by doctors, and even by chemists, whom we can certainly assume would be the least likely to be prejudiced in behalf of my contentions concerning the danger of allowing these man-made food substitutes to masquerade as real foods. Yet these men of chemistry seemingly are curiously conservative and frequently equivocal and obscure whenever they comment upon their own chemical creations or those of their colleagues.

Henry C. Sherman, professor emeritus of chemistry at Columbia University, and a world-wide authority on ersatz foods, speaking of the development of food substitutes in Germany, had this to say:

> There is no doubt that more use can be made of vegetable proteins whenever there is sufficient reason for doing so. Soybeans and peanut proteins have very nearly the same nutritive quality as meat proteins but the mixture would not be allowed to be called a new form of meat here, and should not be.

Those words of a distinguished chemist reflect the reason why extreme caution should be the watchword of this body in approaching the far-reaching issue before us.

I venture to say, Mr. President, the reason why all reputable scientists approach the problem of synthetic foods so cautiously is that they are looking to the future with the same awe and fear as I am—pondering what terrible effect these synthetic, inorganic foods might have on the normal physical and mental growth of our future generations.

Let me call attention to the conclusions which appeared in a paper in the Journal of Nutrition, written by R. K. Boutwell, R. P. Geyer, C. A. Elvehjem, and E. B. Hart, all of whom are attached to the Department of Biochemistry, College of Agriculture, University of Wisconsin.

On the subject of filled milk, they write in effect, as follows:

These data are related directly to the question of the desirability of allowing the manufacture of a filled milk which may become the sole source of nutrition for the growing child. The data make it apparent that a great responsibility would be thrown on those who believe that such a product as filled milk as the sole article of nutrition could function adequately in early nutrition.

Unpublished data have shown definitely that filled milks are inferior to whole milk in growth-promoting properties when fed to young rats. By a filled milk we mean a skimmed milk fortified by vegetable oil to the same fat level as a whole milk.

VEGETABLE OILS AS SUBSTITUTE FOR BUTTER CAUSE BONE FRAGILITY

I could submit endless scientific data of similar substance and I assure Senators that reading these scientific comments has given me pause—particularly all the scientific projections relating to the mental and physical well-being of the generations to come, not to mention the many doubts expressed concerning the virtues of elements which are contained in oleomargarine.

Not long ago I read a paper written by C. U. Moore, published in Northwestern Medicine in which he stated:

It has been found that substituting vegetable oils for butter causes a decalcification of bones, resulting in their fragility.

Substantiating this statement, G. H. Zeithraus, M. Neymark, and E. M. Widmark, in a comparative investigation of the influence of butter and margarine on the calcium assimilation of growing and full-grown rats in full vitamin supply, have this to say:

Decalcification of bones, resulting in their fragility, may well be a result of a vitamin-F deficiency since margarine is inferior to butter in calcium resorption even on a full diet of the other vitamins.

These and the previously submitted scientific statements relating to the principal ingredients of an already legalized food product, must certainly impress this body with the imperativeness of extreme caution in reaching a determination on the vital issue before us. This alone should suffice to convince even the most cynical among us of the unseen dangers that lie ahead if our judgment in this case should err. However, I shall submit evidence and still more evidence to justify my fears in this momentous matter and in a solemn endeavor to enlist the unanimous support of this body to prevent an ersatz food monopoly on these shores.

CANADA LAW PROHIBITS SYNTHETIC ADULTERATION OF BREAD

Perhaps one the most specific statements on the subject at hand was contained in an article by Agnes Fay Morgan in Science magazine. She writes:

No food is safe, unless it is free of any kind of synthetic adulteration, representing crude attempts to replace valuable organic constituents lost in processing. Wherever this has been attempted, the result has been found futile, and has proven to be actually dangerous. Tests made on dogs with white flour fortified with synthetic vitamins demonstrated that the fortified flour killed dogs quicker than the old white flour, unfortified. That is why Canadian laws now prohibit the adulteration of bread or flour with synthetic materials of any kind. If the vitamin content is to be raised, it must be done by retaining the original factors, not by adding new ones of unknown effect.

CHINA ALSO DEVELOPS SYNTHETIC FOODS

Singularly enough, Mr. President, despite these grave warnings, the tendency to imitate the world's basic foods is more manifest than ever before, even in distant lands. Christopher Rand, a Yale graduate who served in the OWI in China during the war and afterward as a correspondent in China for the New York Herald Tribune, writing in the May 1949 issue of the Atlantic, says:

It may be, as some experts claim, that milk and meat are necessities in any human diet, and that their absence leaves an intolerable vacuum. Indeed, this claim is borne out by the Chinese themselves for they have taken a seemingly most unlikely object, the soybean, and from it have worked out a series of foods that duplicate, to an amazing extent what cows give us. By grinding soybeans in small, primitive mills they make a white fluid called tou chang, that tastes somewhat like milk, that looks like it except for being on the bluish side, and that is said to have much the same food value, minus the butterfat. This is a popular morning drink. It is sold, warm and usually sweetened. * * *

From this same grinding process the Chinese also make a white bean curd, tou fu, of a consistency somewhat tougher than junket, which is often cured into a brown and more leathery substance called tou fu kan. Either way it is cooked into soups and stews as if it were meat. It has about the same protein content, and of course it is much more in line with the Chinese emphasis on the vegetable kingdom. The poor can eat it relatively often. It has a religious use among Chinese Buddhists, who are vegetarians. Some Buddhist temples operate restaurants where the idea is to imitate all sorts of meat dishes with bean curd. The imitation is very realistic, and things like pork chops and drumsticks are copied exactly. Bean curd is even sometimes pickled until it becomes a cheeselike substance, called tou fu ju. You can't say it tastes like Roquefort or Liederkranz or Camembert, but it is the same general order of thing. Some American cheese fanciers have become very fond of it.

In the same article, Mr. Rand goes on to say:

During the war I was stationed for some time in the south China hinterland, and there I came to realize that dairy cows have almost no place in Chinese life. The peasants around me made their living by intensive hand farming, really gardening, on small rice paddies. They were constantly having children, and their whole idea was to feed as many mouths from each paddy as they could. To this end they lived almost entirely on rice, with a sprinkling of vegetables and with a few bits of meat on feast days.

ORGANIC FOODS ESSENTIAL TO CHILD HEALTH

Mr. President, we have all seen news reels of China in which the pathetic, prematurely old faces of Chinese children, their stomachs bloated from an unvarying diet of rice, peer out at us from the screen, telling us the tragic story of malnutrition better than any words I can use here. We have seen pictures of African children and children from New Guinea, half-starved little gamins, many of them diseased, because they have been subjected to a diet consisting mainly of coconuts. Then, we have seen the children of those countries which have carefully guarded and nurtured their dairy industry—the happy, healthy children of Norway, Denmark, Sweden, and Holland. These youngsters, like the average child in America, are well-fed, bright-eyed, plump-cheeked, intelligent, and alert. Mr. President, this is the major reason why I say that we cannot afford to take the first step toward tendering the chemical corporations of this country unlimited license to tamper with nature's handiwork, and then to sell the resulting concoctions to the people of this Nation.

I fully realized when I adopted the stand that I ran the risk of having this body regard me as a reactionary or perhaps as one who seeks to retard the progress of science. But I promise the Senate it is neither my desire nor intention to place curbs on chemistry or science in their relation to civilization's progress. I merely contend that a nation like ours, which can boast of an unparalleled heritage in natural food resources, which can boast of our rich grazing lands and fertile soil—I say that a country whose earth will produce virtually every edible variety of vegetation would be foolhardy in the extreme to promulgate laws which might permit ersatz food, such as those inspired in time of war in Hitler's food-drained Reich, to supplant foods produced by nature. I predict that many of these synthetic conglomerations would not only prove injurious to our public health, but would wreck the dairy industry and precipitate a national depression.

Mr. President, I do not propose to lend my support to any legislation which would be the means of making people of this Nation human guinea pigs for the unending experiments of every scientist, biochemist, nutritionist, and synthesist who might be inspired to produce a chemical food substitute.

SOYBEAN AND COTTONSEED OIL PRODUCTS DO NOT STAND TO GAIN

Actually, I sincerely believe that many of the deluded pressure groups who favor the yellow oleomargarine legislation now before us will be the first ones to accuse us of short-sightedness if we permit shipment in interstate commerce of oleomargarine colored in exact imitation of butter. Yes, the cottonseed-oil producers and the producers of edible fats and oils, as well as soya- and peanut-butter oils, who now stand firmly against those of us who are sponsoring the Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment, and those of our constituents who favor the oleo legislation, will later turn upon us if we pass this yellow oleomargarine bill. As it is, the Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment is a compromise bill which we are accepting in lieu of stronger legislation. It removes all the taxes from oleomargarine, and I am in favor of removing them, but I can assure you that the soybean-oil producers and the cottonseed-oil producers are going to rue the day when they determined to line up on the oleomargarine side of this issue. A rude awakening awaits these pawns in the oleomargarine strategy because when the taxes are removed, the powerful oleomargarine cartel which, as I have pointed out, is fathered by Unilever, Ltd., of London, will import copra oil which they can produce at slave-labor prices on their own African plantations, and the soybean-oil and cottonseed-oil producers will then become the forgotten men of the oleomargarine industry.

PRECEDENT IS POWERFUL IN LAW

No, Mr. President, I shall not help to hoist a signal flag for every experimenter in chemical foods and every lobbyist for the chemical corporations to pounce upon us and upon the Pure Food and Drug Administration with the challenge: "If you permit the oleomargarine producers to manufacture and sell a wholly synthetic product which smells, tastes, and even looks like real butter, why can we not then have equal privilege to produce synthetic meats, cheeses, ice creams, milk and eggs?" ad infinitum, ad nauseam.

CHEMICAL COMPANIES WOULD DUPLICATE OLEO PROPAGANDA IF YELLOW OLEO IS LEGALIZED

Mr. President, those of us who have served on this body for any length of time and those of us who have practiced at the bar are fully cognizant of the power of a precedent. Surely we are not so naive as to think that the great chemical manufacturing companies of this Nation and in many countries abroad are sitting idly by, twiddling their thumbs, while this potentially vast new industrial vista looms in the distance. We can be sure that this is not the case. We would be safe in the assumption that the geniuses of chemistry are, this very instant, busily engaged over their test tubes in their laboratories, developing synthetic chemical foods of every variety against the day when we of this body might make the fatal error of creating the loophole which would open the way for their lobbyists and propagandists to repeat the performance so skillfully inflicted upon us by the Oleomargarine Trust. But I do not wish to see this prognostication proved correct. I believe this body is sufficiently wise and farseeing to detect and correctly analyze the profoundly subtle implications involved in the complex problem which we are here to consider today.

Mr. President, I have unbounded confidence and faith that my colleagues will weigh their decision on this measure without narrow partisanship. But, in conclusion, I make this solemn plea: Think and think and think again, and then think once more before Senators utilize the power vested in them by the people of this Nation to countenance the possible defilement of our country's natural food supply by the unknown quantities of chemistry. Think and think still again before crucifying 2,500,000 dairy farmers and plunging millions of other Americans into the depths of a depression merely to gratify the greed of the Oleomargarine Trust.

Mr. President, yesterday I presented an amendment to the pending measure which provided for a fairly broad reduction of the excise-tax structure, particularly the rates which were set in the Revenue Act of 1943. For the convenience of other Members of the Senate I would like to explain what is provided in this amendment.

The language of my amendment is identical with that which is sometimes called the Johnson amendment, sponsored by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], and now pending on the Senate Calendar as a part of House bill 3905. In preparing this amendment I have made no changes whatever from the language of the Johnson amendment, even though I have personally been interested in several other changes in excise rates. I retained the language of House bill 3905 exactly as it was reported by the Senate Finance Committee, because those particular reductions have already been passed on by the Senate Finance Committee and have received its stamp of approval. In voting on my amendment when it comes up, therefore, Members of the Senate will be voting on something which has already been favorably acted on by the committee.

The changes provided by this amendment affect admissions, electric-light bulbs, furs, jewelry, luggage, toilet preparations, communications, transportation of persons, and photographic apparatus. In the case of admissions, furs, most jewelry, and toilet preparations the rate would be reduced from 20 percent to 10 percent. Watches selling at retail for not more than $65, and alarm clocks selling for not more than $5, which are now taxed at 10 percent, would continue to carry the 10 percent rate.

The rate on electric-light bulbs would be reduced from 20 percent to 5 percent. The tax on transportation of persons would be reduced from 15 percent to 10 percent. The rate on local telephone charges would be reduced from 15 to 10 percent, and the rates on other types of communication would be reduced from their present scale of from 8 to 25 percent to a scale running from 5 to 20 percent.

In the case of luggage, the retailers' excise tax of 20 percent is eliminated entirely, and in its place the manufacturers' tax of 10 percent is restored. The manufacturers' tax applies to fewer articles than does the present retailers' excise tax. For example, it does not apply to ladies' handbags but is restricted only to trunks, valises, traveling bags, suitcases, hat boxes for use by travelers, fitted toilet cases, and other travelers' luggage, and leather and imitation-leather brief cases.

The tax rates on photographic equipment have been especially burdensome and have apparently sharply reduced sales and employment in that vital industry. The tax on cameras and camera equipment was particularly high—25 percent—and was imposed early in the war for the primary purpose of discouraging civilians from purchasing such equipment at a time when the national defense needed virtually the entire output of the industry. By the terms of my amendment, the present 25-percent rate on cameras and camera equipment, and the 15-percent rate on films, would both be reduced to 10 percent.

Last year when this proposal was under consideration by the committee, the revenue loss on an annual basis was computed to be about $628,000,000. The category in which the largest single loss of revenue occurs is admissions. The admissions tax is primarily a tax on the average man when he goes to inexpensive places of amusement, such as motion-picture theaters. In my judgment, this tax is particularly objectionable, since it is paid very largely by the poor man and not by the rich man.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not feel that my proposal is merely an attempt to load down the oleomargarine bill with amendments. This question of revising the excise-tax structure has been before us for several years, but the Congress has never had a real chance to vote on the question. If my amendment should be rejected, there is no guaranty at all that we shall have another chance to vote on excise-tax reduction at this session of Congress. The leadership has given us no definite guaranty that excise-tax reduction will be permitted to come up for action this year. If my amendment is defeated, therefore, it is very possible that these burdensome tax rates will continue as a part of the tax structure for at least another year, if not longer.

Inasmuch as both the committee bill and the Gillette-Wiley substitute are before us at this time, I am moved to ask the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], who has taken the lead in proposing this substitute, whether at this time he will accept my amendment as a part of his substitute?

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, a few days ago at a conference of some 15 or 16 Senators who are cosponsors of the bill, the other cosponsors not being able to be present, this matter was debated. I personally offered a similar amendment to the original bill. The substitute measure affects a tax similar to other excise taxes now imposed, with this difference, that when the oleo tax was adopted there never was any promise that it would be repealed, but when the war excise taxes were adopted, they were adopted with the condition and with the promise that they would be repealed as soon as the war was over. The war has been over, and so I feel that in all justice if we are going to have an elimination of one excise tax we might as well have a debate in relation to the elimination of all excise taxes, or a modification thereof. Therefore I accept as part of the substitute measure the amendment suggested. I modify my amendment accordingly.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. As I understand, the Senator is merely accepting the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska to become a part of his amendment, and to lie on the table.

Mr. WILEY. It becomes a part of my amendment, the substitute amendment. We are not voting on any amendment.

Mr. MAGNUSON. It becomes a part of the substitute amendment?

Mr. WILEY. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. SCHOEPPEL in the chair). The Senator from Wisconsin modifies his amendment accordingly.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Does that require unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the Senator has the right to modify his amendment.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the substitute amendment, that was offered by me on behalf of myself and other Senators, now be reprinted, with the several amendments I have accepted as a part of the substitute amendment, so it will be available to the Members of the Senate tomorrow or the following day, as we debate the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF POLITICAL TACTICS IN WISCONSIN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, yesterday I sent out to the people of my State a release which I had prepared on the subject of certain outrageous tactics followed by the Democratic Party of Wisconsin in pursuing shake-down tactics against humble civil-service employees. I have urged a Department of Justice investigation of these tactics, and today I received an acknowledgment of my letter from our former colleague and able associate, the Honorable Howard McGrath.

In reviewing my release and the text of my letter to the Attorney General, I trust that it will not be assumed to be political, and lightly dismissed as a purely partisan expression. I assure my colleagues that if my own party were ever guilty of the tactics of which the Democratic Party is guilty, I would condemn the culprits as strongly as I condemn these Democratic opponents. In any event, my party has not been guilty of any such blackjack approach, and I pray and believe it never will be.

I ask unanimous consent now that there be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD my own prepared release and letter on this crucial question of clean politics, clean relations with civil-service employees, and fair play.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the release and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILEY URGES INVESTIGATION OF WISCONSIN DEMOCRATIC PARTY PRESSURE TACTICS ON CIVIL-SERVICE EMPLOYEES

A request for an investigation of outrageous pressure tactics of the Democratic Party, of Wisconsin, has been made by Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Republican, of Wisconsin.

The senior Badger Senator has made public a copy of a letter sent to a post-office employee by the Wisconsin Democratic finance office in Milwaukee, which, said WILEY, "arrogantly demanded in effect and by implication financial contributions on the part of the particular postal worker" and "on the part of literally thousands of other civil-service employees to whom a similar letter is apparently being sent."

In a statement supplementing release of the letter and of his message to Attorney General J. Howard McGrath, WILEY stated that, "17 years of holding national office has made the Democratic Party so smug and arrogant in its power that it thinks it can resort to shake-down tactics such as this in Wisconsin. We have always had comparatively clean politics in our State, but this type of vicious pressure against humble civil-service employees is more characteristic of Jersey City under Boss Hague than it is characteristic of the type of affairs which we have known in Wisconsin."

POSTAL WORKER'S COMMENTS

The civil-service employee who sent Senator WILEY this letter stated:

"This is the third high-pressure attempt to solicit support for the Democratic organization. The first occurred last fall at the time of the rally and banquet in Milwaukee when we were more than just invited to purchase a $25 ticket. The second was for a subscription to the party organ. * * * This letter lends support to the whole idea to whip civil-service employees into the machine."

THESE PRESSURE TACTICS MUST BE STOPPED RIGHT NOW

"Anyone who has eyes to see," said WILEY, "can read into this very short Democratic letter the obvious pressure implication, without jumping to any unjustified conclusion. If the Democrats are allowed to get away with dictatorial letters and tactics such as this, the time may come when not only civil-service employees, but ordinary citizens, will be threatened by implication for failing to be listed as a contributor to the Democratic Party. I believe that not only the Department of Justice should investigate this and similar letters and tactics, but that the people of Wisconsin should show at the polls that they are outraged by this vicious technique of the Democratic Party."

JANUARY 4, 1950.

Re pressure of Democratic Party of Wisconsin against civil-service officeholders.

Hon. J. HOWARD MCGRATH,
Attorney General,
Department of Justice,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: Your Department has already received indications that there is deep apprehension in our Nation over the fact that the Democratic Party in certain States and/or on a national basis seems to be using tactics which violate the spirit and/or the letter of the Hatch Act and related statutes which ban participation in politics by civil-service employees, and which ban pressure against such employees for the soliciting of contributions to political campaigns.

You and I realize, of course, that this is a political and election year, and almost inevitably such a topic as this, will become the subject of partisan discussion and charges. I do, however, feel that the facts in the following case which I am going to cite to you merit the serious consideration by your Department on a nonpartisan basis and that these charges should be considered on their merits.

I have in my hand a letter sent on December 27 from the State of Wisconsin Democratic Finance Office at 753 North Fifth Street, Milwaukee 3, Wis., signed by Mr. Jerome Fox, State chairman, and Mr. Carl Thompson, national committeeman.

This letter was sent to an employee of the Federal Government (whose confidence and privacy will be respected). Apparently this letter is but one of literally hundreds and thousands sent out on a similar basis to a list of civil-service office holders.

TEXT OF DEMOCRATIC PRESSURE LETTER

The letter reads as follows:

"Our records do not show you listed as a contributor to the Democratic Party in 1949. We would appreciate your contribution before the end of the year, so that party activities and the 1950 campaign fund can be assured."

It is obvious to any observer—whether Republican or Democrat—that this type of letter smacks of blackjack tactics against a humble civil-service employee, leading the employee to believe that unless a contribution is forthcoming the individual may suffer drastic consequences, insofar as his job is concerned. This is not jumping at unfair conclusions on my part, but it is based upon a clear recognition of what is obviously implied by the letter.

Such an arrogant letter might better have been written in Moscow rather than in Milwaukee or in Jersey City under Hague control, because it savors of this type of approach: "Come across, Bud, or else!" The letter does not lead the reader to believe that a contribution is purely voluntary or might not even be expected. On the contrary, it leads the reader to believe that a contribution is definitely expected and required to be forthcoming.

By what right does the Democratic Party in Wisconsin or anywhere else approach civil-service employees and crack the whip at them, implying as if such employees were bound to make a contribution?

DEMOCRATS HAVE FLOUTED SPIRIT OF LAW

Legal pedants may say that this letter does not violate the letter of the law, because quite clearly it has been framed very skillfully in order to try to avoid outright violation. Nevertheless, it is clear that, for all intents and purposes, pressure is being used on civil-service employees. I refer you, also, to the charges filed by the Young Republican Federation of Wisconsin against political misuses of the considerable number of census jobs that will be opened this year.

It seems to me that the Department of Justice might well issue a statement clarifying the letter and the spirit of existing laws against political pressure on civil-service employees. I emphasize the spirit aspect because obviously, pressure artists can avoid prosecution by adroit phrasing of their communications, but in so doing, they will be making a hollow mockery of the Nation's statutes.

Some cynics may scoff, saying that pressure tactics are used by both parties whichever is in power. Such a cynical approach, however, hardly justifies violation in spirit of the Nation's laws. Two wrongs have never made a right. Nor, I respectfully submit, has my party ever been guilty of wholesale, premeditated violation of the spirit of the Nation's election laws.

Thanking you, and with every good wish, I am,

Sincerely yours,

ALEXANDER WILEY.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have been informed today that an amendment has been pending in one of the committees to modify the Hatch Act, which would more or less make the tactics of which I complain pardonable, and would render the law of no effect. The tactics simply are these, that a shake-down method is being practiced by saying to civil-service employees, in substance, "You got your job through us, did you not? So come across."

Mr. President, if such conduct is permissible, we might just as well get rid of the Civil Service, we might just as well throw everything open in the future and say, "To the victors belong the spoils."

The tactics are the same as those some of our good labor people are pursuing, levying payments of $2 apiece on the membership of the unions. Just before I left home a young lady came into the office and said, "My husband has been paying $6 a month dues to the union. Today he got a notice of a special assessment of $2, the purpose of which was to create a political fund to defeat you, Senator."

There it is, Mr. President. There is nothing wrong about that, if they want to do it, but I am frank to say that I have had a number of communications from laboring men throughout my State indicating that they do not like such tactics. But those who are pursuing them are entitled to do so. However, under the civil-service law the party in power is not entitled to go into the program of initiating political "takes" from those who have received employment, and that is what I am complaining about.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

Mr. ECTON. Mr. President, as one of the cosponsors of the Gillette-Wiley amendment, I wish merely to take a few minutes this afternoon to set forth my views on the proposed oleo legislation. My own personal thought on the matter is that this type of legislation has been given time and energy and has been subjected to propaganda clear beyond its importance to the people of the country, and I hope that we may be able to arrive at a time in the near future when this controversial issue as presented before the Senate of the United States may be resolved one way or the other.

I do not believe that any of us who are sponsoring the amendment which is in the nature of a substitute bill can be deemed to be antagonistic either toward the manufacture of oleo or to its consumption in its natural state by the people of this country. We do not wish to deny anyone the privilege of using oleo if he desires to use it. I think all of us have used it and have enjoyed it on many occasions. All we are attempting to do by the substitute amendment is to prohibit falsification in any manner or description. When butter is sold as butter, we want it to be recognized as butter. When oleo is sold as oleo, we want it to be recognized as oleo. We do not want anyone to be fooled.

As the distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] has told the Senate, we are perfectly willing to relieve the oleo manufacturers and the consumers of a tax which has been imposed upon them for many decades. We think we should do that in the interest of fairness and fair play, and in the interest of free competition with good edible products flowing in the business economy of our country. I hope we may be able to get this legislation to an early vote and decide the question, so the American housewife will no longer be confused, as she has been confused since the pending bill was first introduced 2 years ago.

The oleo manufacturers and their interests did a high-powered job of propagandizing the housewives of the country. It has caused us a great deal of trouble. Propaganda has gone forth to the effect that if the Congress of the United States would but remove the taxes on oleo the housewives could then buy colored oleo in the market.

Such is not the case in every State of the Union. There are numerous States which have statutes specifically forbidding the sale of colored oleo within their respective borders. My own State of Montana is one of those States. The sale of colored oleo is absolutely prohibited in my home State. We in Congress cannot do anything about that by the legislation now pending. That question must be determined by the people not only of my own State but of all the States which have statutes prohibiting the sale of colored oleo.

Mr. President, it has repeatedly been suggested during the course of this debate that butter is such a relatively unimportant dairy commodity that it might as well be thrown to the wolves. The wolves, in this instance, are the oleomargarine manufacturers who apparently are more than willing to supply the butter markets with their yellow imitation.

Perhaps the best answer to those who would scuttle butter is the rather trite assertion of the dairy farmers that butter is the balance wheel of the dairy industry. By this they mean that whatever affects butter affects every other dairy product. There must be a great deal of truth in their statement. Why else would the Department of Agriculture choose butter as the dairy commodity upon which to base its price-support program?

On December 22 the Department of Agriculture announced its dairy price-support program extending from January 1950 through March 1951. It announced support farm prices on manufacturing milk and on butterfat, and stated that the program will support the price of all milk. As a means of carrying out this support, the Department announced prices at which it will make carlot purchases of cheese, nonfat dry-milk solids, evaporated milk, and butter. It is significant to note that in these price-support operations during 1949, $70,000,000 of a total expenditure of $125,000,000 was for butter.

The passage of House bill 2023 would affect the agricultural economy of most of the States of the Union and very seriously affect the economy of dairy States. Approximately 22 percent of the agricultural income of the Nation comes from dairy products and animals, and from 25 to 30 percent of the butterfat produced goes into the manufacture of butter. Some two and one-half million American farmers are dairymen. The enactment of this bill would upset the rotation system of crops produced, conservation of soil, and the agricultural economy of most of these farms. I believe it would seriously affect the livestock crop rotation of the Nation and would annually cost its taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars in additional price supports for dairy producers. The Commodity Credit Corporation already has, I believe, some 100,000,000 pounds of butter on its hands.

Butter is and always has been what might be called the pivot product of the dairy industry. When fluid milk, ice cream, or cheese sales fall off, the surplus butterfat has always found an outlet through butter. Curtail this outlet and disruption of the whole dairy industry will occur.

The so-called cream check coming into the farm home regularly, especially during times of depression, has been the one thing that has saved thousands upon thousands of small-farm families from total bankruptcy. Mr. President, I am receiving letters from my constituents each and every day stating those facts. The people have not forgotten the depression years. They have not forgotten how dependent they were upon their weekly cream check. That check has bought the shoes and clothes for thousands of children who could otherwise not have gone to school.

Because of the consumption of feed grains and other crops required by the dairy animals, they have been a major stabilizer in preventing disastrous surpluses of such crops, and have thus helped to preserve a reasonable price for them.

Oleomargarine propagandists profess to see no reason why the loss of a part or all of the butter market to oleomargarine should seriously trouble the dairy farmers. They point out, quite correctly, that producers receive less for milk used for the manufacture of butter than for that sold for fluid consumption. Since that is true, they argue, let the farmers sell more of their milk as fluid milk, turn over the table-spread market to oleo, and everybody will be happy.

Unfortunately the oleo propagandists fail to take into account several important facts:

First. Urban consumers are already buying all the milk they desire at current prices, and lower prices in general are not in the picture because of costs of production. It is, therefore, impossible for farmers to divert any large volumes of milk for butter into milk for fluid use.

Second. Fluid-milk consumption is fairly uniform the year around. Herds must supply enough milk for fluid consumption during the fall and winter period of low milk production. These same herds will obviously supply more than enough to meet fluid requirements during their period of flush production. Butter is one of the most practicable forms in which seasonal and other surplus milk can be stored.

Third. Much milk that goes into butter is produced in areas of the country far removed from fluid markets. This segment of the dairy industry is, nevertheless, essential, both as a source of manufactured dairy products and of beef and veal, 40 percent of which is supplied by our dairy herds.

These points add up to the major fact that, oleo or no oleo, butter will always be important in the dairy industry. It cannot be done away with in favor of fluid milk. But it can be depressed in price by the competition of a low-cost substitute colored and flavored in its exact imitation.

To the extent that this happens—to the extent that yellow oleo is permitted to usurp the table-spread market—all dairy products will suffer price reactions. The prices of fluid milk cannot long withstand the effect of drops in the butter market. In recognition of this, the price structures of fluid milk in scores of primary and secondary markets are tied in part to butter prices.

Yellow oleo can never be other than a drag on butter prices and on dairy product prices in general. This is because it is made from cottonseed and soybean oil; and it can readily be made from coconut oil. With our free trade program in operation that might well occur. Even the oleo manufacturers who have been making oleo out of soybean and cottonseed oil, might find some serious competition. The three oils are interchangeable, and the one that costs least governs the price for all. The low-cost coconut oil produced in the tropics with low-cost labor holds down the price of cottonseed and soybean oil, and the cost of oleo.

Now let us come to the real meat in this oleo bill, namely, what has been held out to the laboring people and the housewives by all this propaganda? Mr. President, they have been told that they are going to be able to get colored oleo at a cheap price. However, such is the farthest thing from the truth; there is no truth in it.

Suppose that House bill 2023 were passed. If it were, it would result in removing one-fourth of a cent a pound tax on oleomargarine; that is all it would do, so far as concerns reducing the cost of oleomargarine to the average housewife in the United States. The result would be to save the average American family the insignificant sum of probably not to exceed from 50 cents to $1 or $1.50 a year. I ask you, Mr. President, who has been fooled in this entire matter? I say most emphatically that if Senators wish to provide a cheap spread, cheap oleo, to the consumers in the United States, it would be much better to leave the present law as it is. Then the housewives of the United States would be able to buy uncolored oleo and either use it in its uncolored form or take it home and color it themselves, and hold down the price. But once this proposed legislation is enacted and once oleo can be manufactured as yellow oleo and placed in competition with butter, we shall see how fast the price will rise, and the housewives and the laboring people of the United States will really find out that they have been badly fooled. I predict that when that occurs it will react against the use of oleomargarine in the United States.

The manufacture and sale of oleomargarine have been making rapid progress in spite of the absolute prohibition by about 21 or 22 States of the sale of yellow oleomargarine. They do not prohibit the sale of uncolored oleomargarine, but they prohibit the sale of colored oleo.

Let us examine the figures to see how yellow oleo sales have increased in the United States under the legislation which has been on the statute books since the early 1900's. For instance, yellow oleo production in 1947 amounted to about 5,000,000 pounds a month; in 1948 it rose to approximately 8,000,000 pounds a month; and in 1949 the production had increased to 15,000,000 pounds a month. Who has been hurt under the oleo legislation which has been on the statute books of the United States for fifty-odd years? The oleo manufacturers have not been hurt; and the people who consume oleo have not been hurt, because they have been getting oleo cheaper than they will ever get it again if they permit yellow oleo to flow freely in interstate commerce. It is altogether probable that if House bill 2023 were passed in its present form, instead of in the form of the substitute we propose, the price of oleomargarine would advance, and United States consumers in the aggregate would have millions of dollars annually added to their food bills.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ECTON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WILEY. I wish to congratulate the Senator from Montana on making a very fine, factual statement of a situation which is very critical.

I wish to call his attention to the fact that in 1948, out of a sale of 908,000,000 pounds of oleo, only 91,000,000 pounds were colored—in other words, approximately 10 percent. So we see that the argument the Senator from Montana has presented is based on solid ground, namely, there is a desire on the part of the manufacturers of oleomargarine to color all the oleomargarine and then soak the public for the additional cost. In the past they have captured a market which has ranged, in 1930, from 325,000,000 pounds, to 1948, when they had 908,000,000 pounds. Yet in that increase, only 91,000,000 pounds were colored. So the Senator's statement is correct, namely, that if the consumers in the United States want cheap oleomargarine, they should not adopt the suggestion of the Oleo Trust, so to speak.

Mr. ECTON. I thank the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin for his observation. I think anyone who has given this proposed legislation his studious and honest and unbiased consideration can come to no other conclusion. Anyone who wishes to help poor people in this country had better take off the taxes on the manufacturers and the wholesalers and the retailers, but prohibit the sale of colored oleomargarine everywhere except in the States which now specifically permit it. I think it would be the fair and the reasonable and the most logical thing to do.

Mr. President, if we would be honest with ourselves and our constituents, we would have to admit that practically no financial benefit would result to anyone save the small group of manufacturers and the retailers of oleomargarine if either the pending bill or the bill as changed by the amendment were passed. Some additional income might be realized from producers of soybeans and other vegetable fat crops; but in only a short time, if the policy of this administration is continued, no doubt foreign products shipped into this country would all but eliminate any benefit to American producers.

Any action taken by the Congress that would harm the dairy industry—and surely this bill if passed would do so—would have serious repercussions upon the entire national economy.

Finally, every product—whether food, fiber, or mechanical—should expect to find sales outlets on its own merits, and not through imitation. Legalizing the sale of yellow oleomargarine would, in my opinion, be most unfair and misleading to the consuming public, unfair to the agricultural economy of great areas of the United States, and would result in fraud and deception and in great costs to the Federal Treasury.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ECTON. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Is the Senator familiar with the vote on what is now the pending bill in the Senate, when it was in the House of Representatives last year?

Mr. ECTON. I do not recall the vote in the House of Representatives, but I recall there was before the last legislature, in my own State of Montana, a measure the purpose of which was to repeal the law prohibiting the sale of yellow oleo in the State of Montana. How many votes for repeal does the Senator think were cast? Only 12.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I have no doubt about it; but the vote in the House of Representatives last spring was in the neighborhood of 287 for repeal; that is, in favor of the committee bill, the bill which is pending in the Senate at this time, to 89 against repeal. Does not the Senator think it is rather odd, if the bill is such a vicious one from the point of view of the farmers, that the vote in the House of Representatives should have been so overwhelming in favor of repeal?

Mr. ECTON. No; I do not.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The year before, at the preceding session, the vote was almost the same. There was but a slight difference.

Mr. ECTON. When we consider the propaganda that was used in favor of the bill throughout the country a year or two ago, I am not very much surprised at the vote. I think if it could have been brought before the Senate at that time there would have been many Senators who would have yielded to the pressure, who would have relaxed their resistance, so to speak, and who perhaps would have gone along. It might be interesting to the Senator from Arkansas to know that in 1 week it was necessary for me to send 3,000 letters replying to letters received from the people of my State, to tell them that, regardless of what was done by the Congress, they still could not buy yellow oleo. That was due to the propaganda that was spread throughout the country. The statement has been repeated many times on the floor of the Senate that the oleo manufacturers of the country spent more than $6,000,000 for publicity in that campaign.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator has no proof of that.

Mr. ECTON. No.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It is merely the Senator's statement, is it not?

Mr. ECTON. I am merely making the statement.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator knows nothing of his personal knowledge of any such thing, does he?

Mr. ECTON. No.

Mr. WILEY. He did not get any of it?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. No.

Mr. ECTON. No; I am not accusing anyone of giving any Senator anything.

What I am saying is, we know that when letters are sent to the people in the 48 States of the Union, and when full-page advertisements are placed in newspapers and magazines, it costs money.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Does not the Senator know that the only advertisement which has been published in the newspapers locally is the one which was published by the butter industry day before yesterday? No doubt, the Senator saw it. So far as I know, there has been no advertisement on the part of the oleomargarine industry. The only advertisement that has been published since we returned for the present session was one published by the butter interests, 3 days ago, which, I assume, the Senator saw. The only implication of the Senator's remark is that the House of Representatives is very easily fooled. The Members of the House do not know anything about the matter, and therefore the Senate must save the country. That is what it comes down to, is it not?

Mr. ECTON. No. I would not cast any reflection on our good colleagues in the House of Representatives. They can vote for anything they want, but when it comes to the Senate, we should look at all the facts and make up our own minds. We cannot help what the House does. The Members of the House of Representatives are not responsible to us, and we are not responsible to them. I certainly am not casting any aspersions on any Members of the House.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I was very much interested in the brief exchange of ideas between my friend to the left of the aisle and my friend to the right, about what happened in the House of Representatives. The Senator from Arkansas did not ask what happened in the committee, or what kind of bill the House committee reported. It was virtually the same as the amendment I have offered during the debate on the pending bill.

Again I want to compliment my good friend and Republican associate from Montana. He has brought out some very salient facts. He has brought out the fact, which is in no way contradicted, that the oleo interests have spent approximately $6,000,000. Anyone knows that when full-page advertisements appear in the great national magazines, they cost anywhere from $2,000 to $10,000 or even $20,000, depending upon the circulation of the magazines.

I call the attention of my good friends to a significant thing. Last year when this subject was being debated, by reason of the misrepresentation of the facts by the oleo interests, I received in the neighborhood of 25,000 letters from the folks in the cities of Wisconsin, telling me what I should do. Since the present debate opened, I have not received a letter from the city folks. Why? Because they are now aware of the truth. They know that almost maliciously there was undertaken a campaign making an issue of the tax, arguing that the tax made the cost of oleomargarine so much higher for the dear consumer. Of course, the consumers are interested in obtaining free food, if necessary, or cheaper food, but all at once it began to dawn on them, as it has now dawned on Senators, that if the oleo interests are to be permitted to color their oleomargarine yellow, irrespective of State law, irrespective of the right of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, the oleo interests are going to charge what the traffic will bear. It is a significant thing that within the past few years 3,000 dairy cows have disappeared from the farms of America. That is by reason of the increase in the percentage of the spread market taken over by the oleo interests. A few moments ago I enumerated what that was. It has gone from approximately 300,000,000 pounds to over 900,000,000 pounds, leaving only about 1,300,000,000 pounds to the butter producers. If the oleo interests take that, as they intend to do, what will happen? Three thousand cows have disappeared from the farms. Already, within the past 2 or 3 years a quarter of a million people have left the farms. What is to be the result? We must not forget that about 35 percent of the beef produced in this country is produced from cows. Get rid of the dairy cow, and where is the consumer going to get his beef? Then what are we going to do? The consumer will pay the price which the Oleo Trust says he must pay. There will be no restriction upon it. When the competition between oleo and butter is eliminated, and when the oleo interests take over the market, the prices of oleo will go up. That has already been clearly indicated in many places. Recently in the State of California oleo prices have varied as between community and community from as little as 15 cents a pound to as much as 55 cents a pound. There is no restriction.

I suggest therefore to my good friends that we should stop, look, and listen before we do that which will not only destroy the dairy farmer and his dairy herd, but will mean to the consumers of America an increase in the cost of living. The consumers now have their choice. They can buy yellow butter or they can buy oleomargarine uncolored and, in some places, colored. But if it is permitted to be colored, we shall not only have the fraud that now exists, when oleo is advertised, as indicated by my colleague, as a dairy product, but the fraudulent practices will be extended.

At this point in the RECORD I desire to show the ingredients of oleomargarine. It is very interesting to note what they are. Oleo is about as composite a product as any chemist ever conceived of. At this place in the RECORD, I ask that there be printed a table which I shall produce from the record of the hearings. It is table 11, materials used in the manufacture of oleomargarine in the United States by calendar years 1928–48, as set forth at pages 98 and 99 of the hearings of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, in April 1949, on the bill H. R. 2023, known as the oleo tax-repeal bill.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. ECTON. Mr. President, I thank the senior Senator from Wisconsin for his comments, and assure him that I agree with all he has said. We can look the world over, and it is almost axiomatic that a nation and its people's standard of living are in direct ratio to the number of dairy cattle owned by that nation and its people. As the Senator from Wisconsin has stated, the dairy herds of the country give us many advantages in addition to supplying the spread for our bread—for example, leather for making shoes, milk and cream for making cheese. The economy of any community is stabilized, in any state or nation, by the dairy industry, and we should do nothing by legislation on a national level that would even put a sense of fear in the dairy interests. I do not believe the Senate is going to do that.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I wish to comment briefly on the table which I have placed in the RECORD. Listing the materials used in the manufacture of oleomargarine, we find corn oil, cottonseed oil, peanut oil, soybean oil, babassu oil, coconut oil, palm oil, lard neutral, oleo oil, oleo stearin, oleo stock, other animal products, such as beef fat, tallow, milk—mostly skim—vitamin concentrate, salt and other conditioning ingredients, rape oil, rice oil, sesame oil, palm kernel oil, sunflower oil, ouricuri, palm stearine, palm flakes, whale oil, lard flakes, monostearine, red oil, neat's-foot oil, and miscellaneous soap stock.

Those ingredients are printed on the package in very small type, but no one can take time to read it.

Those are the ingredients, Mr. President, which go into the product with which the oleomargarine manufacturers would take over the butter market.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Is the Senator stating of his own knowledge that those ingredients are contained in oleomargarine?

Mr. WILEY. I did not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Is the Senator saying of his own knowledge, that those are the ingredients of oleomargarine?

Mr. WILEY. I am taking them from the record. I am not an oleomargarine producer, if that is what the Senator's question implies.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. What is the Senator's authority for the statement?

Mr. WILEY. The authority is found in the tables in the RECORD, taken from Government records.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Those are tables submitted by the butter producers. The Senator knows very well that there is no fish oil contained in oleomargarine.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I did not understand the Senator from Wisconsin to say that those ingredients are used in oleomargarine.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is what I understood him to say.

Mr. AIKEN. I understood him to say that those ingredients are permitted to be used. I think the Senator goes back to the law which permits the manufacture of oleomargarine, and it will be found that fish oil is permitted to be used.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator says those ingredients are printed on the label of oleomargarine. I say that is not true. It seems to me the least we can do is not to try to mislead persons who read this debate.

Mr. AIKEN. I think it is probable that castor oil and tung oil could be eliminated from the ingredients, but I think the other types of oil mentioned are permissible, although many of them are not commonly used.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask that the RECORD be corrected, because I am sure the Senator realizes that in my haste I failed to refer to the percentage of primary fats and oils used in the manufacture of edible products, other than shortening. I should like to correct the RECORD. This is what goes into oleomargarine:

Cottonseed, prime summer yellow; coconut oil, refined; soybean oil, edible; peanut oil, refined; babassu; linseed oil, raw; oleo oil; neutral lard.

The source of that information is the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, United States Department of Agriculture.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I do not agree that those ingredients go into oleomargarine at all. There are many statements in the RECORD. Most of the ingredients which the Senator has mentioned are not used in oleomargarine. What he has read is what could be used; it is not what is used.

Mr. WILEY. If the Senator is such an expert, would he mind informing us just what goes into oleomargarine?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Yes. Cottonseed oil, primarily, to the extent of practically 60 percent. The next largest ingredient is soybean oil; the next is skim milk or dried skim milk. Skim milk is usually utilized because of the ease in using it. The product contains less than 2 percent of peanut oil and corn oil. The principal flavor is milk. Then there is the same flavor which butter manufacturers use. Every trade magazine advertises this flavor, and I know the manufacturers will not keep on advertising it if it is not used. Under the law it is not supposed to be used.

Artificial flavor is also used, and a preservative is used.

Mr. WILEY. Is any rape oil used?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. No.

Mr. WILEY. Sesame oil?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. No.

Mr. WILEY. Beef fat?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. No.

Mr. WILEY. Tallow and whale oil?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. No.

Mr. WILEY. Lard?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. No. Neither are gasoline, lubricating oil, or dynamite used in the manufacture of oleomargarine.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, if the debate has degenerated into a question of who is telling the truth, I now ask that the table appearing on page 98 of the hearings before the Committee on Finance, United States Senate, Eighty-first Congress, first session, on House bill 2023, be printed in the RECORD. The source is the Bureau of Agriculture Economics, United States Department of Agriculture, and the table shows that oleomargarine contains substantially the same ingredients I read previously. I ask that my previous statement be stricken from the RECORD and that the table appearing on page 98 of the hearings be substituted therefor.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. WILEY. Then I shall read:

Corn oil.
Cottonseed oil.
Peanut oil.
Soybean oil.
Other vegetable.[1]
Babassu oil.
Coconut oil.
Palm oil.
Lard neutral.
Oleo oil.
Oleo stearine.
Oleo stock.
Other animal.[3]
Milk (mostly skim).
Vitamin concentrate.
Salt and other "conditioning" ingredients.[4]

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin how long he thinks it will take to finish the debate on the oleomargarine bill? I ask the question because the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] made that request of me.

Mr. WILEY. I think it is a very reasonable request. Approximately 15 Senators met a few days ago, and we felt that by next Friday, perhaps, we might be able to reach a vote on the bill, the substitute, and all amendments. I am frank to say that I have my doubts about it at this time, because, while I have been negotiating with my good friend who is leading the fight for the bill, as I am leading it for the substitute, there seems to be no meeting of minds on the subject. While we might be able to reach a vote on the substitute, with the amendments which I have accepted and which now become a part of the substitute, I have a suspicion that other amendments to the bill will be proposed. If that be the case, I am sure there will be no agreement as to closing the debate. I hope we can have a little talk on that subject tomorrow.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I speak only for myself. May I ask whether the proponents of the bill—and I address the question to the Senator from Arkansas—would be willing to fix a time, whether it be Friday or whatever day may be determined upon, when the bill and all amendments thereto can be voted upon without further debate.

Mr. LUCAS. I should be delighted, as majority leader of the Senate, to enter into that kind of an agreement, and I will say to the Senator from Vermont that I certainly hope that may be done. It seems to me that the remainder of this week should afford sufficient time for the debate.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator from Arkansas is on the floor. I wonder if he would agree that we might have a vote on the bill, without further debate, at a specified time.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I should be very glad, and have suggested to the Senator from Wisconsin that we would like to enter into such an agreement, with the usual provision regarding nongermane amendments.

Mr. AIKEN. Oh, Mr. President, I certainly would not care to leave it to the Senator from Arkansas to determine what a nongermane amendment was.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. We had many agreements of that kind at the last session. The Senator is quite aware of the significance of that. It is not for me to determine—it is for the Parliamentarian to determine. The very simple question is that we would not agree to the attaching of an FEPC amendment to the pending bill, and then agree to have a vote on the bill.

Mr. WILEY. How about the poll tax?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. But all the amendments I know of that have been offered to the pending bill are germane, in my opinion. I do not know of any that are not. There may have been some offered in the last few minutes.

Mr. AIKEN. Does the Senator mean that he would object to a request for a vote on the bill and all amendments at some specified time without further debate?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I would object to no agreement, with that one provision, which was customary, I think, in every unanimous-consent agreement we had last year. There is nothing new about it. I do not have to tell the Senator from Vermont what it means.

Mr. WILEY. That is the crux of the whole difference between us.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That was true of every unanimous-consent agreement I know of at the last session.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, as I understand from the title of the bill, there probably would be no nongermane amendment, because it is to repeal the tax on oleomargarine, "and for other purposes." I do not know why the words "for other purposes" were put in the title, but it seems to me that makes almost any amendment germane.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I would not attempt to tell the Senator about it. He has had far longer experience than I have. He knows as much as I do what is meant by an agreement as to germane amendments.

Mr. AIKEN. If the Senator from Arkansas would delay a final vote on the bill——

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It is all right to misrepresent margarine, but to misrepresent the attitude of the proponents of the pending bill I would say is not in order. We are perfectly willing to vote on the bill and on the amendments that pertain to the question covered by the bill, at any time, tomorrow or the next day, or the next day, but because there is an incipient filibuster developing here I do not think the Senator should attempt to put the blame for it on the proponents of the bill.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not think the Senator from Arkansas should infer that there would be a continuing filibuster if amendments he does not like were proposed.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, my attention was distracted. I wish to have it clearly understood, and I think the Senator told me today he understood, that, so far as I am personally concerned, there is no idea of any filibuster, and I am certain no one can accuse us of filibustering so far. The foreign situation has been injected through no exertion on my part. I personally feel it is well to dispose of one thing at a time, but under the rules of the Senate we can debate anything, but I certainly say that no southern Senator should accuse any northern Senator of filibustering unless he talks at least a month.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. There is no reason at all why we southerners should be accused of participating in a filibuster. We all know that not much progress has been made in debate, and last Friday we had to take a recess shortly after 2 o'clock.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I do not think that the Senators who are opposed to the margarine bill have attempted up to this point to filibuster the pending question. I am sure the Senators who talked upon the foreign policy were in nowise involved in an attempt to delay a vote upon the bill.

Mr. WILEY. I thank the Senator. That clears the atmosphere. Otherwise I would have replied to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. LUCAS. I was afraid the Senator would say that, but there would probably be more heat than light.

Mr. WILEY. That calls for a reply, because if the Senator thinks he is the source of all light in the Senate he had better go some place.

Mr. LUCAS. I regret I made that statement, if the Senator feels that way.

Source: Bureau of Agricultural Economics, U. S. Department of Agriculture.

Mr. WILEY. I am serious about it. I do not like these facetious digs anymore than the Senator does.

Mr. LUCAS. I am not yielding any further to the Senator until I finish, and I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will try to observe the rules of the Senate, because he is one Senator who constantly chips in when another Senator is talking, whether the Senator yields to him or not.

What I am trying to do is to move along with the debate, and seek to reach some sort of a decision upon the pending measure before the week shall expire, if we can do so. I do not think there is reason for any heated words between any Senators on this question. I think the debate has gone along in as orderly a manner as possible, and my only thought was that if we could get a vote before the week expired the country would be very happy about it, and we could move on with other business. After all, this is a pretty important year, as I said the other day, and if we become involved in long discussions upon extraneous matters we may be in session this year longer than some of us would like to be. Nevertheless, we have a program to carry out, and we are going to try to carry it out irrespective of the amount of time it entails.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. Speaking only as one Member of the Senate, from a dairy State, who likes to do things differently from some of the Senators from the other States, I should be very glad to agree to a vote on the bill and all amendments thereto at a specified time, preferably not later than Friday.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator for his statement, but I believe that if the Senator will examine the unanimous-consent agreements of the past session, he will find they have always been accompanied with the provision referred to by the Senator from Arkansas. That has been done primarily on the suggestion of the Senators from the South, because of their intense interest in the civil-rights program. I think the Senator will find that almost universally, in every unanimous-consent agreement, it was provided that only amendments that were germane could be voted on.

Mr. AIKEN. Personally, I think civil-rights legislation is probably as important as the removal of the oleomargarine tax.

Mr. LUCAS. I think it is more important.

Mr. AIKEN. May I ask the Senator when he expects to call up the civil-rights legislation?

Mr. LUCAS. I cannot say exactly to the Senator when we are going to call it up. We have a program that is scheduled for the next 2 weeks, approximately. It all depends, in great measure, on how far we go in the debate with respect to the measure now pending before the Senate. The Senator understands that on the 20th of this month the basing-point bill will automatically come before the Senate. I hope that will not take too much time, but one cannot tell. Judging the future by the past, the basing-point program will consume a considerable amount of time.

Following the disposition of the pending bill we have other measures which we can take up, including an amendment to the Hatch Act and the measure proposing an amendment to the Constitution relating to equal rights for women.

Mr. AIKEN. Does the Senator contemplate taking up the civil-rights legislation following the disposition of the basing-point bill?

Mr. LUCAS. I am not sure, but there is a possibility that we will take up one of the bills at that time.

Mr. AIKEN. Does the Senator expect a civil-rights measure to be taken up by the 1st of March.

Mr. LUCAS. I think so; yes.

Mr. AIKEN. My reason for asking is that many Members of the Senate are fearful that the only way they may get a chance to vote on the civil-rights legislation would be by way of amendment to some other bill.

Mr. LUCAS. I can assure the Senator that he will get a chance to vote on some phase of civil rights legislation before the session closes. The poll tax bill is still sleeping quietly in the Committee on Rules and Administration. I have appealed to my good friend, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], who is chairman of that committee, to try to bring the bill out of the committee, but so far I have been unsuccessful. The antilynching bill is pending on the Senate calendar, and the FEPC bill is pending on the Senate calendar. Insofar as I am personally concerned, I consider the economic question involved in the FEPC legislation far more important than either the political or the social questions involved in the other two bills. I have discussed the matter with the Policy Committee, and it is my intention as majority leader to take up the FEPC bill at some time in the near future, but the exact date I cannot say.

Mr. AIKEN. I thank the Senator from Illinois, the majority leader. I am sure he is sincere in his assertion that he is going to bring up that bill.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator from Vermont for his last statement, and I assure him I would not make this statement on the floor of the Senate if I did not know that that was going to be done. Furthermore, I sincerely hope that in the debate on the margarine bill we will keep all extraneous matters from cluttering up what seems to me a perfectly good issue. We have our agreements and disagreements upon this very important question, but from the time I have been a Member of the Congress, the past 15 years, I have taken a very decided view about attaching immaterial and irrelevant amendments to a measure before the Congress. I have voted against them, even though I favored many of them if they could be debated on their merits in the regular way, that is, if they came to the Senate through the proper committees and were called up as individual propositions and debated.

I am in favor of repeal of certain excise taxes, perhaps of all of them. But I can not vote for an amendment attached to this bill providing for repeal of excise taxes, because such an amendment does not belong on this bill. That is my position. I cannot vote for such an amendment. If such an amendment should be adopted, the first thing we know we would have excise taxes and margarine taxes all mixed up, and the bill, with such an amendment in it, would go back to the House, and to the House Committee on Agriculture which reported the margarine bill. I think those who are truly interested in the repeal of excise taxes should hesitate and pause before they vote to place such an amendment on the margarine bill, unless they are more interested in defeating the excise taxes than they are the margarine taxes, because, before we get through with the legislation, we might not have either kind of taxes repealed.

Mr. AIKEN. I think the position of the majority leader is well taken, and I believe that a rider to a bill is justified only in the event that it appears improbable that any other opportunity will be afforded to vote on the subject of the rider.

Mr. LUCAS. I think there is some justification for that position.

Mr. AIKEN. Does the Senator from Illinois feel sure that the Senate will have an opportunity to vote on the repeal of excise taxes in the near future?

Mr. LUCAS. I will answer the Senator in this way: The able Senator from Vermont knows that there is a bill on the calendar at the present time which deals with excise taxes. As I recall, the House of Representatives has passed that bill, H. R. 3905. That bill went to the Finance Committee, and the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] attached an amendment to that revenue measure providing for repeal of the excise taxes. As I recall he did not propose to repeal them completely, but I think it was proposed that about 50 percent of the excise taxes should be repealed. That bill is on the calendar, and in the event we do not get an opportunity from the House of Representatives to debate and repeal the excise taxes in what I consider an orderly way, we will then, before we finish, take up the bill which is now on the calendar, dealing with the repeal of the tax on the importation of copper, as well as the repeal of other excise taxes, and through that measure, I will say to the Senator from Vermont, we would then be in a position to discuss with the Committee on Ways and Means of the House the question of the repeal of excise taxes. Otherwise, we would be dealing with the Committee on Agriculture if the excise tax repeal were tied onto the margarine bill. But I again assure the Senator from Vermont that we will also take up that bill before we finish the session, if we do not get the proper kind of an excise-tax repeal bill from the House of Representatives, from which it should come in the beginning, as the Senator well knows.

Mr. AIKEN. I thank the Senator from Illinois, but it seems to me to be a little unusual to take up the matter of repealing a single excise tax, such as the excise tax on oleomargarine, without consideration of all the other excise taxes. I am sure that is the reason why apprehension is raised in the minds of some, that if the pending measure is passed, they might not have an opportunity to vote on the repeal of the other excise taxes. I will accept the word of the Senator from Illinois on that matter.

Mr. LUCAS. The apprehension of the Senator from Vermont is understandable, but it is not well-founded. I think the Senator will agree with me that it is not, after my explanation as to what we expect to do.

Furthermore, with respect to the margarine tax I will say that was a regulatory tax, rather than a revenue-raising tax. It is in a little different category. It is really not an excise tax from that standpoint. It was passed as a regulatory measure many years ago, and from that angle it stands in a different classification and category from all the excise taxes which were imposed during the war for the purpose of raising revenue only. That is another reason why, in my opinion, a proposal to repeal the excise taxes, should not be attached by way of amendment to this bill.

Mr. AIKEN. Of course, a tax originally imposed as a regulatory tax, the margarine tax, has recently become a fairly important revenue tax. At the present time it is yielding about $17,000,000 annual income.

Mr. LUCAS. It is yielding sixteen or seventeen million dollars annual income. The Senator is correct about that. It has more or less shifted from a regulatory to a revenue tax. But in the first instance it was passed as a regulatory tax.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. Oh, the Senator from Illinois does not know how I love to hear him say that, after having previously said that I "chip in."

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator was chipping in——

Mr. WILEY. Now we see how the Senator from Illinois is chipping in. The Senator is using a poker term, and is not playing cricket now.

Mr. LUCAS. Just a moment. I have the floor.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, who has the floor? The Senator from Illinois yielded to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has the floor, and yielded to the Senator from Wisconsin for a statement.

Mr. WILEY. I thank the Chair.

Mr. LUCAS. I yielded for a question. If the Senator wants to make a speech——

Mr. WILEY. No; I will say just a word, and then we will depart in peace.

Mr. LUCAS. Well——

Mr. WILEY. Does not the Senator want us to depart in peace? Does the Senator want peace or want war?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I love the Senator from Wisconsin, and I do not want any war with him.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I love to hear the Senator say such things. It is very lovely of him, toward the close of the day, to feel that way about me, but words speak louder than actions at times.

Now, talking about excise taxes, the Senator has brought up a very nice question. The facts will demonstrate that from about 10 percent of all the oleo, and that is all that is colored, the Government collects a tax of $17,000,000. If the Government wants a source of revenue—and the Government certainly does want sources of revenue—it could place a 10-cent tax on the whole 1,000,000,000 pounds of oleo made now. That would result in more than $100,000,000 of additional tax. Instead of that, the oleo interests, sensing that there might be, as the Senator from Georgia now suggests, a reevaluation of the whole tax program, have injected this thing on such a basis that the consumer has felt he has been seriously impacted.

I think it might be a pretty good thing, Mr. President, if some method were evolved by which the whole measure could go over until after election, so that the people could really get an understanding of what is involved, and the proper committees could investigate the significant revenue question which is also involved here.

I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Since the junior Senator from Minnesota is a cosponsor of the Wiley substitute, I want my position to be perfectly clear. I understand that on the floor this afternoon the Senator from Wisconsin accepted an amendment to our substitute which provides for the repeal of excise taxes. Am I correctly informed as to that?

Mr. LUCAS. I so understood.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I accepted the amendment which had already been adopted by the appropriate committee; that is, the so-called Johnson amendment to the copper measure, and which was submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER], and which has become, by my acceptance, a part of the substitute measure.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield further?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I want my position with reference to this legislation to be perfectly clear. I entered into cosponsorship of the substitute amendment because of my belief in the justice of our position. I have not entered into any understanding that I will be a party to conglomerate amendments attached either to the main bill or to the substitute. It is my considered belief that neither the civil-rights bill nor the excise-tax amendments ought to be a part of this debate or of this legislative proposal. I believe that those of us who are cosponsoring the amendment in the nature of a substitute are doing a disservice to our cause, to the validity of our position, if we attempt to block this legislation by what I call a parliamentary trick.

I have no intention, I will say to the majority leader and to my colleagues, of being a party to what I consider to be beneath-the-table conniving or strategy to kill this oleo bill. As one participant in the debate, I happen to believe that the Senator from Arkansas and those associated with him are going to lose this fight if we can simply vote the bill up or down.

I hope that my friend the Senator from Wisconsin will reconsider his position, or at least I hope he will be kind enough to take us into his confidence. After all, I am one of the cosponsors of the substitute amendment. I believe I should have been consulted. I believe the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] should have been consulted. Possibly he was; I do not know as to that. But if he was not consulted he should be consulted before we make these rather hasty decisions. So long as I have had the assurance from the chairman of the Finance Committee, I wish to state now that in my considered judgment we are going to have a chance to vote on the repeal of excise taxes. I want to vote on the repeal of excise taxes, for which I stand, and for which I shall work as a separate item of legislation. Likewise, I say it is my desire to vote on civil-rights legislation as a separate item of legislation.

I stated my position on this subject pretty frankly in the Democratic caucus. I sort of feel bad that we should have gotten ourselves into this sort of a predicament. I wish to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I do not think we strengthen our case before the American people by being willing to accept a dozen or more amendments, or even one amendment, from the floor that may not be particularly germane to the subject.

We are talking now with reference to a bill which authorizes the shipment in interstate commerce of a commodity which we say is trying to misrepresent itself. Now, I think we are trying to misrepresent ourselves if we are willing to accept amendments which have no place upon this bill. While I intend to vote for the substitute and intend to work for the substitute, I do not intend to let my conscience be stultified by accepting amendments which I do not believe are germane or worthy of being attached to the pending legislation.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I will yield in one moment. I should like to reply to my colleague from Minnesota. The Senator from Minnesota, in a very forcible and clear-cut way, has presented the issue with respect to nongermane amendments, and I wish to commend him for taking the position he has taken. I think he is absolutely correct in his position and in his premise and conclusion in regard to all nongermane amendments to the pending legislation. In view of his vital interest in the dairy industry of his State, and in view of the cause he represents in connection with this measure, I think the position he takes is highly commendable.

Now I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, again I wonder who is indulging in parliamentary tricks. We had a conference in my office. The Senator from Minnesota was invited to be present; he was on the committee. At that conference, in view of the vote taken last year, by which the proponents of oleomargarine on the floor of the Senate enabled oleomargarine to take over the butter market which formerly existed in the Army and the Navy; in view of the fact that, under the bill as introduced, the Government will be deprived of the income from the tax on oleomargarine; in view of the fact that the committee had already reported a bill for the removal of present excise taxes; in view of the fact that the President of the United States was to send a message to Congress in regard to excise taxes; and in view of the fact that everyone seemed to be in favor of removing the excise taxes, it was decided that the Johnson-Butler amendment should be incorporated in my substitute amendment.

Now all at once we find that some persons throw out a smokescreen, saying, "Do not remove the excise taxes." They make that statement in an effort to deprive other Senators of an opportunity to vote definitely on the question of whether millions of farmers should be deprived of their livelihood. Mr. President, we want a show-down on that issue. If it is perfectly all right to deprive millions of farmers of their livelihood, to get rid of 36 percent of the production of beef in this country, and to deprive the Government of the income it has previously obtained from oleomargarine, then I say it is perfectly legitimate—and that was the consensus of opinion of those who attended the meeting—that we should attach this amendment to the substitute, not to the bill.

As I told the distinguished Senator who is sponsoring the bill, this is a way to demonstrate effectively to the people of the United States that they can get what they want, to wit, removal of the oleomargarine tax, in respect to which $6,000,000 has been spent to propagandize the people. It is one way to make it possible for colored oleomargarine to be sold, except in interstate commerce or in the States where the sale of colored oleomargarine is prohibited; and it is one way, more than any other, whereby we can demonstrate to the small merchants, to the fur industry, and to others who have been hit by the wartime excise taxes, that we mean business. If we consolidate our forces and bring together all those who are in favor of removing the wartime excise taxes, then we can win.

I say to my good friend, the Senator from Minnesota, that when he votes against the substitute, with or without attaching to it the amendment respecting excise taxes, he will find that we do not have it in the bag; he will find that the oleo interests will once more have put us in the hole.

A few minutes ago, before the Senator from Minnesota returned to the Chamber, we were requested to enter into a stipulation to the effect that relevant amendments could not be attached.

Mr. LUCAS. No; irrelevant amendments.

Mr. WILEY. Well, some might call them relevant.

But the point is that Senators will not be able to obtain a vote which will satisfy the people of the United States if they follow along the line suggested by the Senator from Minnesota, for Senators then will vote in relation to the oleomargarine proposition; and when that occurs, Senators will find themselves confronted with the other amendments which have been suggested, but which many Senators do not want. Already they are being suggested. They are not attached to my substitute. The only amendments attached to my substitute are the one providing for the repeal of excise taxes and the amendment relating to the advertisement requirement; and everyone seems to agree that they are proper. Those two are the only ones which are attached to my substitute.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I merely wish to clarify the record in respect to what may be an interpretation of the remarks made by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The junior Senator from Minnesota did not participate in a conference in which he ever agreed to the acceptance of excise-tax-repeal amendments.

Mr. WILEY. I agree to that.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I was invited to the conference, but I did not agree to that.

I merely want it made clear that, insofar as my position is concerned, I feel that by that agreement we are not strengthening the moral or ethical aspects of our case. I entered this debate in the belief that the argument we were putting up and the case we were presenting were sound and strong and morally defensible, and I still believe they are. I still believe that what I stated on the floor of the Senate this afternoon is the issue in this case; namely, the issue of monopoly versus small business or the free-economy issue. I am prepared to defend that issue and to fight out the battle along that line.

Certainly I do not wish to usurp the prerogatives of the majority sponsor or cosponsor of the proposed legislation, who, along with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], has presented it to the Senate; and I do not wish to say that they do not have a right to accept amendments. I merely say it would have been nice if the 25 cosponsors could have been together on this matter, and if it had been possible to see whether all of us were of a like mind.

I know the Senator from Wisconsin would not expect me to be bound by his decision, and I shall reserve the right to form my own judgment when the vote comes.

However, I do accept the statement made by the majority leader and the statement made by the chairman of the Finance Committee that we shall have a chance to vote for the repeal of excise taxes. We ought to repeal them and we shall hold the majority leader and chairman of the Finance Committee to the statements they have made.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I should like to make one other statement, and then I shall conclude.

Under the parliamentary situation, any Senator has a right to move to strike any portion of the substitute amendment, as it has been modified from time to time by the Senator from Wisconsin. I think I am correct in that statement. So when the time comes no doubt a motion will be made to strike from the substitute the amendment dealing with the repeal of excise taxes, and then we can have a straight vote, either up or down, on the question of whether we wish to include such an amendment.

I am sorry the junior Senator from Minnesota has just left the Chamber.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I wish to concur in what the Senator from Minnesota has said. I was in the Chamber this afternoon when the Senator from Wisconsin accepted the so-called excise-tax-repeal amendment.

I also am one of the sponsors of the so-called Wiley-Gillette amendment. We accepted the excise-tax-repeal amendment merely for purposes of printing. It lies on the desk.

But, knowing that a motion would be made—if not made by any other Senator, I myself would make it, as one of the sponsors of the original amendment—to separate the two or to strike the latter one, as the majority leader has suggested, no objection was made to accepting it now. Of course, objection could have been made by one of the sponsors; but then another amendment could have been proposed. So objection then would have served no practical legislative purpose.

Of course, like the Senator from Minnesota, I think this addition seriously weakens the position of those of us who have sincerely believed in the approach of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Iowa. I wish to associate myself with them, having been on the floor of the Senate this afternoon when the acceptance of the excise-tax-repeal amendment occurred. In fact, there were practically no Senators here at that time but the two of us, I believe, and the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator who was presiding over the Senate. That was the situation when the acceptance occurred, as I recall.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I am glad the Senator from Washington has made the statement he just made.

I say again that every Senator who is a cosponsor of the amendment was notified, or his office was notified, and he came to the conference, and we agreed upon this procedure, just as the Democratic conference agreed on their procedure, as is evidenced by the positions taken by two of the Senators who are now present. They agreed on their procedure. They have demonstrated today that they are holding the front; and they will destroy the benefits which should accrue to the farmers by this bill, if they continue in this way. We have showed them how to win. The Senator from Minnesota says a great moral right and great equities are involved. Certainly they are. However, his farmers do not mean anything to him if he can see the issue in the way he indicates.

On the other hand, I agree with the Senator from Washington that when I accepted the amendment, that did not preclude any Senator from having a right to move to strike what I accepted. Consequently, we have a clear understanding.

But let it also be clear that our good Democratic friends are lining up in accordance with their conference, as reported recently in the newspapers; and it is very clear that the farmers of the United States will now know whom to hold liable, if and when we get a chance to vote on the original bill.

But if certain other amendments, which I have not agreed should be attached to my amendment, are attached to the original bill, some of our Democratic friends will be on the other side of the fence in not agreeing to those amendments.

That is the situation in a nutshell, Mr. President. Perhaps after getting this discussion off our chests, tomorrow we can talk a little more rationally, and ascertain whether there is a basis for compromise, so that we can get some bill which will properly take care of the oleomargarine situation and also the tax situation for the benefit of the country.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The Senator is, of course, expounding his views with respect to an analysis of what the practical legislative procedure should be. I am just as wholeheartedly for the substitute amendment as the Senator is. I think if we put forward the amendment just as it is, relating only to the oleomargarine and butter controversy, the Senator will get more votes from both sides of the aisle than he will by resorting to legislative maneuvering in an attempt to attach the excise taxes or the civil-rights amendments, because there are many of us who sincerely favor the original amendment. We are cosponsors. We would not vote for it with those things attached. I think those of us who are sincere in trying to do what the Senator from Wisconson I know wants done had better search ourselves. Senators had better search themselves as to the legislative procedure, because the quicker we vote this bill up or down the quicker will the whole thing be determined. We should not clutter it up with all these other amendments. I grant that the excise taxes are a proper subject of legislation, but they are not germane to the issue now before the Senate. The Senator from Wisconsin knows that to be so. The same thing is true of other amendments. I hope the Senator will be persuaded even to vote with us when we move to separate the excise-tax proposal from his amendment.

Mr. WILEY. I cannot accede to the Senator's argument.

RECESS

Mr. LUCAS. I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, January 11, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 4, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Rev. Alvin C. Murray, minister, First Methodist Church, Berryville, Ark., offered the following prayer:

Our eternal and ever-present Father, God, we are always conscious of Thy goodness in the interest of our affairs. We thank Thee that Thy hand has been seen using mysterious ways Thy wonders to perform in the history and the life of man. We pray that Thou shalt work through us to accomplish Thy ends, that we might achieve noble purposes in all our endeavors. Give us grace to examine our motives rather than simply to seek selfish ends. Give us the wisdom that comes from contemplation of Thee and from introspective thought and love of Thy Son. Guide us, use us, give us courage. In Christ's name we pray. Amen.

ATTENDANCE OF A SENATOR

KARL E. MUNDT, a Senator from the State of South Dakota, appeared in his seat today.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. LUCAS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, January 10, 1950, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business of the Committee on Public Works.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. THYE obtained the floor.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Members of the Senate be permitted to introduce bills and joint resolutions, present petitions and memorials, and submit routine matters for the RECORD, and that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE], who now has the floor, will not lose his rights to the floor thereby.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

REPORT ON POSITIONS ESTABLISHED BY DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

A letter from the Secretary of Defense, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the number of positions established by the Department of Defense, for the calendar year 1949 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Armed Services.

A letter from the Director, Administrative Office of the United States Courts, Washington, D. C., transmitting, pursuant to law, a statement of expenditures of the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1949 (with an accompanying statement); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORT OF CONTRACTS NEGOTIATED BY COAST GUARD

A letter from the Commandant, United States Coast Guard, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on contracts negotiated for experimental, developmental, or research work by the Coast Guard, for the period July 1, 1949, to December 31, 1949 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Armed Services.

REPORT OF GEORGETOWN BARGE, DOCK, ELEVATOR & RAILWAY CO.

A letter from Steptoe & Johnson, attorneys at law, Washington, D. C., transmitting pursuant to law, a report of the Georgetown Barge, Dock, Elevator & Railway Co., for the calendar year 1949 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the PRESIDENT pro tempore:

A resolution adopted by the Great American Prospectors' Association, favoring the payment of the legal monetary price of silver to American prospectors and miners beginning February 15, 1950; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The petition of Elbert Jefcoat, of Shingle, Calif., relating to old-age and survivors insurance; to the Committee on Finance.

Resolutions adopted by the Fourth Congressional District Townsend Council, and a Sunday rally of citizens held in Lumus Park, Miami, both in the State of Florida, favoring the enactment of the so-called Townsend plan, providing old-age insurance; to the Committee on Finance.

A paper in the nature of a petition, signed by Hans J. Isbrandtsen, president, Isbrandtsen Co., Inc., of New York, N. Y., relating to attacks by the Chinese on American-flag ships; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A letter in the nature of a petition, signed by Mrs. Mary Klepinger, of Union, Ohio, relating to the enactment of legislation prohibiting the transportation of alcoholic beverage advertising in interstate commerce; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

A letter in the nature of a petition from Max Kloen, of Oyster Bay, Long Island, N. Y., relating to the reissue of certain letters patent; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A resolution adopted by the Colfax County Education Association, of Clarkson, Nebr., favoring the enactment of legislation providing Federal aid to education; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Resolutions adopted by the Mercer Dental Society, of Trenton, N. J., the Ninth District Dental Society, of New York, and the Washington State Dental Association, of Seattle, Wash., protesting against the enactment of legislation providing compulsory health insurance; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

By Mr. JENNER:

A petition signed by sundry citizens of the State of Indiana, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the transportation of alcoholic beverage advertising in interstate commerce; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PROHIBITION OF LIQUOR ADVERTISING—PETITIONS

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a letter from Lucy M. Bon-Durant, member Loyal Women Bible Class, Christian Church, Mount Rainier, Md., transmitting petitions signed by the adult Sunday school classes of the Christian Church, Methodist Church, and Baptist Church, of Mount Rainier, and the Methodist Church of Brentwood, all in the State of Maryland, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the transportation of alcoholic-beverage advertising in interstate commerce. I present the petitions for appropriate reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions will be received and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a letter from Mrs. Nora B. Powell, State legislative director, WCTU, New Castle County, Del., transmitting petitions signed by 1,637 citizens of New Castle County, Del., and 353 citizens of Kent County, Del., in support of legislation now pending before the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to prohibit the transportation of alcoholic-beverage advertising and the advertising of alcoholic beverages over the radio. I ask that the petitions be referred to the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for its consideration.

I am also in receipt of a letter from Mrs. Cora S. Palmer, legislative director, WCTU, Sussex County, Del., transmitting similar petitions signed by 1,073 citizens of Sussex County, Del., urging the enactment of that legislation, and request that they be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petitions presented by the Senator from Delaware will be received and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference a petition signed by 650 citizens of Stuttgart, Ark., praying for the enactment of Senate bill 1847, to prohibit the transportation of alcoholic beverage advertising in interstate commerce, and I ask unanimous consent that the text of the petition be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures attached, with the notation that it is signed by 650 citizens of Stuttgart, Ark.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures attached, as follows:

PETITION TO THE SENATORS OF THE STATE OF ARKANSAS RE LANGER BILL (NO. 1847) WHICH WOULD PROHIBIT THE TRANSPORTATION IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGE ADVERTISING AND STOP ITS BROADCASTING OVER THE AIR

We, the undersigned citizens of Stuttgart, Ark., favor the passage of the Langer bill and urge your support of it.

Increasing numbers of arrests, in our little city, for driving while under the influence of alcohol and for drunkenness, is noted.

Drinking at football games and most all public places is not only on the increase but it is disgusting to the average citizen, and sets a bad example for the children of school age.

This increase in drinking, no doubt, has come along with attractive ads which glamorize drinking as socially correct, seeking to create a false security in moderation.

We feel that "beer belongs" is the most insidious form of advertising, because it enters the sanctity of the Christian family circle. The ads are misleading because they show only scenes before drinking and not the finished product.

Only you and other good Senators, by your vote, can put the Langer bill across. Won't you, therefore, please attend the committee hearing on January 12.

Signed by 650 citizens of Stuttgart, Ark.

4–H CLUB EDUCATIONAL PROGRAM AND FEDERAL ADMISSIONS TAX—RESOLUTION OF SWIFT COUNTY (MINN.) FAIR ASSOCIATION

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference a resolution adopted by the Swift County Fair Association, Appleton, Minn., relating to the 4–H Club educational program and Federal admissions tax.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the county fairs of our State and Nation serve a useful and educational purpose, promoting and encouraging improved agricultural production, promoting and supporting the 4–H Club movement, and where exhibits are a guide to improvement of farm crops and livestock; and

Whereas the county fair is an altruistic organization not operating for profit and is therefore supported by State and county appropriations; and

Whereas the Federal Government now takes in admissions tax an amount equivalent to the county and State appropriations: Therefore be it

Resolved at this the special meeting of the Swift County Fair Association, That the Federal Government be urged to support this educational institution which is helping to develop the work of over 50,000 boys and girls as members of the 4–H Clubs in the State of Minnesota; and be it further

Resolved, That such Federal support be rendered by the elimination of Federal admissions tax now exacted from county fairs, so that county fair associations will have that additional money to further develop their institutions to better serve the public; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to Members of Congress with the request that they introduce and support legislation which would carry out this purpose.

INTERNATIONALISM OF JERUSALEM—RESOLUTION OF PORTLAND (OREG.) ZIONIST COUNCIL

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a letter from A. Victor Rosenfeld, chairman, Portland Zionist Council, of Portland, Oreg., transmitting a resolution adopted by that council with reference to the internationalism of Jerusalem. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be appropriately referred and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas Israel, having won its war of independence, has now taken its rightful place as a free and independent state among the nations of the world and as a member of the community of nations—the United Nations Organization; and

Whereas American Jewry, which has substantially aided in the fulfillment of the Zionist ideal, is eternally grateful to the United States Government for the leading role it played in the effectuation of Palestine's partition and in the subsequent admission of Israel to the United Nations Organization; and

Whereas the security of Israel is now being threatened, this time by the United Nations Conciliation Commission's plan to sever Jerusalem from Israel, a plan which would place all of the Holy City within a 60-square-mile enclave under the "full and permanent authority" of the United Nations; and

Whereas the Jews of Jerusalem, having undergone the most extreme suffering during the war when their city was under siege and in difficult straits, are now being called upon to surrender their city to an alien supervision; and

Whereas the siege of Jerusalem was lifted, not by a United Nations truce, but by the military strength of Israel who, though sorely pressed for its own survival summoned all of its resources to relieve stricken Jerusalem and save it from strangulation; and

Whereas the city of Jerusalem is predominantly Jewish in population (comprising approximately 90 percent of its total inhabitants), in art, culture, educational, and medical institutions; commerce; trade; and industry; and

Whereas for 3,000 years the Jewish people have looked upon Jerusalem with special reverence, regarding it as the spiritual center of the Jewish religion: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, representing the Zionist organizations of Oregon do hereby call upon the United States Government to repudiate the impractical and unjust plan of United Nations Palestine Conciliation Commission which would cut off Jerusalem, the city of Zion, from Israel; and be it further

Resolved, That while we are mindful of the international character of the Christian shrines and holy places in Jerusalem we would recommend that only these sites—and no more—be placed under the supervision of the United Nations; and be it finally

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to President Harry S. Truman and be brought to the personal attention of Congressman HOMER D. ANGELL and United States Senators WAYNE L. MORSE and GUY CORDON.

SYDNEY E. STERN,
President, Zionist Organization of America.
NATHAN DIRECTOR,
President, Mizrachi Men's Organization.
Miss ROSALIE HORENSTEIN,
President, Junior Hadassah.
Mrs. NORMAN BERENSON,
President, Portland Chapter Hadassah.
Mrs. M. FRAGER,
President, Mizrachi Women's Organization.
A. VICTOR ROSENFELD,
President, Portland Zionist Council.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING—RESOLUTION OF MARYLAND LEAGUE OF BUILDING, SAVINGS, AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, during the interim following adjournment of the Congress I received a resolution from the Maryland League of Building, Savings, and Loan Associations, Baltimore, Md., which deals with a subject of the utmost importance to the future security of our country, Government spending.

I may say that the resolution is typical of the sentiments of a great number of individuals and business groups in Maryland who feel very definitely, as I do, that there must be established a policy in the Government's fiscal operations which will recognize that the sound and proved business practice of living within one's income has its application in government as well as in every other field of national endeavor.

I send the resolution to the desk for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the cost of Government, Federal, State, and local, has continued to increase until today more than 25 percent of the national income is taken in the form of taxes for the operation of Government; and

Whereas the Maryland League of Building, Savings, and Loan Associations, like similar associations throughout the United States, represents thousands of substantial citizens who are either buying their homes on monthly or weekly payments or who by self-denial are endeavoring to accumulate by savings a down payment on a home which they hope some day to own, and yet another group who by small weekly or monthly savings are endeavoring to build a modest competence for their old age; and

Whereas every dollar expended by the Government, whether Federal, State or local, is a dollar taken from these thrifty citizens and handicaps them in their efforts toward personal security—a situation existing not only in Maryland but in every State in the Union: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Maryland League of Building, Savings, and Loan Associations on this, its twenty-ninth annual meeting, calls upon our representatives and Federal, State, and local Government officials to give heed to the excessive cost of Government and bend every effort to reduce expenditures and particularly to eliminate unnecessary services.

The secretary is hereby instructed to forward copies of this resolution to Representatives in the Congress of the United States as well as State and local officials.

EDWARD J. BANEY,
President.
GEORGE J. CLAUTICE,
Secretary.

DISMANTLING OF CERTAIN GERMAN PLANTS—PETITION AND LETTER

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD, without the signatures attached, two items. One is a petition addressed to the President of the United States, signed by 700 workers of the Hochfrequenz-Tiegelstahl G. m. b. H., at Bochum, Germany.

The other is a letter from Dr. John B. Crane in regard to the continued dismantling of German plants. Two different committees were called upon to study phases of the dismantling program in Germany, one headed by Mr. Keenan, the other the Humphrey committee. Both of them unanimously recommended that the steel plant at Bochum, Germany, should not be dismantled. Mr. Keenan declared it was indispensable to the recovery and successful operation of the coal mines. The Humphrey committee declared the plant was essential to the efficient operation of the German steel industry and to the economic recovery of western Europe.

Despite the unanimous opinion on the part of the two committees, this steel plant, upon the insistence of Great Britain, is being destroyed. "Dismantling" is the wrong word—it is being scrapped. If we can believe our two committees, it is going to affect very seriously the economic recovery of Europe, and, while we are tearing down this steel plant, we have just completed spending $45,000,000 building a huge steel plant in France. I may say I think the British and our State Department and the ECA are going a long way toward making it impossible for many of us to vote further ECA aid to Great Britain.

There being no objection, the petition and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures attached, as follows:

PETITION OF THE WORKERS OF THE HOCHFREQUENZ-TIEGELSTAHL G. M. B. H.

BOCHUM (WESTPHALIA), December 20, 1949.

The Honorable HARRY S. TRUMAN,
President of the United States,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: It is with heavy hearts that we come to you this Christmas season for help in our despair.

We are 710 workers in the German steel plant at Hochfrequenz-Tiegelstahl at Bochum in the Ruhr. During these next 2 weeks, in a season most sacred of the year to our families, as to all Christian workers throughout the world, we are to see the complete destruction of the plant which is our livelihood.

The reason for this we can never understand. Our badly damaged plant was informed on February 21, 1947, by a written statement of the military government that it was withdrawn from the dismantling list. We rejoiced. With our own hands and no more pay each day than the value of a cigarette, despite great hunger, we speeded up rebuilding the walls of our factory and the reconstruction of the machinery. Three of our skilled steelworkers lost their lives in this sacrifice, because they were inexperienced in construction work. At last our factory was once more in useful operation.

Then the blow fell. With no explanation to us we were placed again on the dismantling list.

Mr. President, from that day to this our lives have been filled with uncertainty and anguish. We have learned that all United States investigating committees argued that our plant was necessary and should be saved. All political parties in Germany have spoken out for us. And still we are doomed.

Mr. President, this Christmas season is one of deepest sorrow for us, and we face the new year with despair. In our town of Bochum there are already several thousand metal workers out of jobs. What then can we look forward to? Among us is a larger percentage than in most German factories of partially disabled workers. These live absolutely without hope now.

We trust you will believe our sincerity when we say we long only to produce things which will be useful in a peaceful world. At this Christmas season we say from the depths of our hearts we long only for peace on earth, good will to men. But to show this and to be convinced democrats, we must be permitted to earn our living with our own hands.

Dear Mr. President, if you can't help us and help us quickly, we and our families will be lost. Will you not, as the leader of the greatest and most humane nation in the world, save our plant and make it possible for us to live as decent, useful people?

In love and hopefulness, we ask this.

Sincerely.

LETTER TO SENATOR MCCARTHY

JANUARY 6, 1950.

DEAR SENATOR MCCARTHY: The Hochfrequenz-Tiegelstahl works (a small steel plant in the Ruhr making high alloy heat-resistant steels) at Bochum has been 35 percent dismantled as of December 21, 1949, and the completion of the dismantling is scheduled by the British for January 25.

Any further dismantling of the plant will affect key furnaces and equipment, and will cause the shut-down of the plant, with over 600 workers losing their jobs shortly after January 15.

EFFORTS PREVIOUSLY MADE TO STOP DISMANTLING OF THIS PLANT

The American Government made two investigations of the Hochfrequenz steel plant at Bochum in 1948. One of these was made by Mr. Keenan, and one by a group headed by Mr. Wolf, who worked for the Humphrey committee (Paul Hoffman's committee). In both cases the American experts unanimously recommended that this steel plant be saved. Mr. Keenan declared that it was indispensable to the recovery and successful operation of the German coal mines. Mr. Wolf declared that the plant was essential to the efficient operation of Germany's steel industry and to the economic recovery of western Europe.

Several United States Senators have intervened with the State Department on behalf of this plant. Among those who have tried to save this plant are Senator GEORGE, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and Senator MCCARRAN, chairman of the ECA "watchdog committee." Moreover, Senators BRIDGES and WHERRY have been active in trying to save this and other steel plants.

PAST AND PRESENT DISMANTLING STATUS OF HOCHFREQUENZ-TIEGELSTAHL PLANT

During the war the Hochfrequenz steel plant was badly damaged by bombings. The British decided the plant was not a war plant and gave the plant a work permit to resume operations, and removed the plant from the reparations list in February 1947.

With the plant removed from the reparations list early in 1947 the management and workers got busy and rebuilt the plant with an expenditure of over 4,000,000 marks. Over 2 years later, on May 5, 1949, the British notified the plant that it would be dismantled beginning July 1, 1949.

As a result of the intervention of Senators GEORGE, MCCARRAN, and others, the British withdrew the dismantling order temporarily, but gave out a new order a month later. They ordered the dismantling to begin August 3, 1949. Dismantling has been in progress since that date and still continues.

In justifying their new order to dismantle the Hochfrequenz steel works the British Government told the State Department that duplicate capacity existed in other German steel plants and that the output of the small Bochum plant could easily be taken over by other steel plants. They said the workers could readily be absorbed in other industries when the plant was dismantled.

I have just returned from Germany where I took occasion to visit the Hochfrequenz plant and to talk with the management. They declare that the bulk of their production cannot be produced in any other steel plant in Germany as it requires special furnaces and highly specialized equipment not available elsewhere. The dismantlement of their plant will make them dependent on imports from the British and French alloy steel industries.

Moreover, I checked with the mayor's office in Bochum and found that the town already has over 2,500 unemployed metal workers as a result of the recent dismantling of the huge Bochumer Verein steel plant which is also located in the town of Bochum.

Hence, if the Hochfrequenz-Tiegelstahl works is dismantled, it will dump an additional 650 workers and their families on the local relief rolls. Since unemployment has been growing in western Germany in recent months, is it desirable deliberately to increase this unemployment by the dismantling of a nonwar steel plant?

The British admit that the Hochfrequenz steel plant is not a primary war plant, and that almost all of its production has always been for major peacetime industries such as the railway industry, the coal-mining industry, the electric utility industry, etc.

ADENAUER INTERVENES TO SAVE HOCHFREQUENZ

Dr. Adenauer, the Reichs Chancelor of the new Federal Republic of Western Germany, has just intervened to try to save the Hochfrequenz plant at Bochum. At the last meeting of the three Allied high commissioners for Germany, held on December 16, 1949, at Petersberg, near Bonn, Dr. Adenauer pleaded for the saving of the Hochfrequenz plant. The commissioners replied that since the plant was not included in the list of plants agreed upon at Paris in November, it was not within their jurisdiction to consider his request.

It should be noted that the decision to dismantle the Hochfrequenz plant was made without any reasons ever being given in defense of such action, and without the Germans ever being told why the plant was to be dismantled, or ever being permitted to refute erroneous statements which have been made about the plant.

It is the consensus of opinion of American experts who have carefully studied the Bochum situation that the major motive behind the British insistence on dismantling the Hochfrequenz plant is the desire to eliminate German competition.

Of great significance in this regard is the fact that the American High Commissioner for Germany, John J. McCloy, told me in a conference in his office at Frankfurt, Germany, on December 19, 1949, that he personally would like to see the Hochfrequenz plant saved.

AN IMMEDIATE MORATORIUM ON DISMANTLING IS NECESSARY

If the Hochfrequenz steel plant at Bochum is to be saved, an immediate moratorium on further dismantling is necessary. Such a moratorium should be for 60 or 90 days, or whatever period is required for the appointment of a special committee to investigate and report on the situation at Bochum. No harm could result from such a moratorium and investigation, while such an inquiry might well prevent a grave injustice being done.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN B. CRANE,
Washington, D. C.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

The following report of a committee was submitted:

By Mr. HAYDEN, from the Committee on Rules and Administration:

S. Res. 180. Resolution to amend rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate with respect to a quorum of committees and subcommittees; without amendment (Rept. No. 1208).

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR REED, OF KANSAS

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, by direction of the Committee on Rules and Administration, I report favorably, without amendment, Senate Resolution 201, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 201) submitted by Mr. SCHOEPPEL on January 5, 1950, was considered and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed to arrange for and attend the funeral of Hon. Clyde M. Reed, late a Senator from the State of Kansas, on vouchers to be approved by the Committee on Rules and Administration.

REPORT OF PERSONNEL AND FUNDS BY COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Pursuant to Senate Resolution 123, Eightieth Congress, first session, the following report was received by the Secretary of the Senate:

JANUARY 10, 1950.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

To the SECRETARY OF THE SENATE:

WALTER F. GEORGE,
Chairman.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. GREEN:

S. 2829. A bill to repeal certain legislation relating to the purchase of silver, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. KEFAUVER:

S. 2830. A bill for the relief of E. C. Browder and Charles Kenyon; and

S. 2831. A bill for the relief of Constantinous Tzortzis; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McMAHON:

S. 2832. A bill for the relief of the Hotchkiss Sales Co.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. CAIN introduced Senate bill 2833, to effectuate the recommendations of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government with respect to the organization of the Department of the Interior, which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. LANGER:

S. 2834. A bill for the relief of Gerd. Anni Berger Fedje; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WILEY:

S. 2835. A bill for the relief of Boris Paul von Stuckenberg and wife, Maria Alexander von Stuckenberg (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MORSE:

S. 2836. A bill to extend the terms of patents No. 97,889, 128,610, 130,479, and 2,138,992; and

S. 2837. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Claire Phillips Clavier; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ORGANIZATION OF THE DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to effectuate the recommendations of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government with respect to the organization of the Department of the Interior, and I ask unanimous consent that a brief explanatory statement of the bill by me be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the explanatory statement will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (S. 2833) to effectuate the recommendations of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government with respect to the organization of the Department of the Interior, introduced by Mr. CAIN, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

The explanatory statement presented by Mr. CAIN is as follows:

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAIN

Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate committee reference proposed legislation dealing with certain aspects of Federal hydroelectric power projects, irrigation-reclamation projects, and flood-control projects throughout our Nation.

This bill, for which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the end of these remarks, has been drafted to follow, as closely as possible, the recommendations of the Hoover Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government as reflects our Nation's water resources.

Nearly all recommendations of the Commission have been drafted into legislation, and this bill virtually completes the introduction of bills necessary to enable the Congress to study various recommendations in legislative form.

My prime purpose in introducing this legislation is with the same view I had in mind when I introduced other bills dealing with multiple-purpose projects. These bills were: S. 1595, introduced April 14, 1949, dealing with the comprehensive plans agreed to by the Army Corps of Engineers and the Bureau of Reclamation for development of the Columbia River; S. 1631, introduced April 18, 1949, dealing with the administration's plan for establishment of a Columbia Valley Administration; and S. 1632, introduced April 1949, which would establish a Columbia Interstate Commission.

When the bills were introduced in the first session of this Congress, I told the Senate:

"Every suggestion and plan ought to be minutely analyzed and studied by the Congress * * * the problem before the Congress is to make as certain as it can that the very best procedures are employed in securing the maximum beneficial good from the broadest utilization of the resources of the Columbia River Basin and any other river basin."

I introduced these various bills in order that all of the proposed development programs for the Pacific Northwest might be, at the same time, before the committee having jurisdiction, and the Congress. Some of this legislation has been introduced only for the purpose of having all plans up for consideration at one and the same time. The three bills I introduced in the last session are, along with other similar bills, now being considered by the Senate Public Works Committee. Hearings have been held in Washington, D. C., on these proposals. Further extensive hearings must be held in the field.

During the hearings already held, numerous and frequent references have been made by witnesses, and members of the committee, to the recommendations by the Hoover Commission on river-basin projects. While these recommendations are on a national, rather than regional scale, they have a direct and important bearing on the Pacific Northwest and I think the time is now here when the Senate should have these recommendations before it, in bill form, for consideration.

Reading of the bill will readily reveal, in simple terms what it proposes to do. As best it could, the legislation was drawn up to follow the recommendations of the Commission as outlined in the Task Force Report on Water Resources Projects, known as Appendix K of the Commission's over-all report. Regardless of whether one is for or against the Hoover Commission proposals, this bill places the recommendations in legislative form for better study. This bill would consolidate all river-development activities of the Nation within the regular structure of the executive department, specifically through a new water development and use service in the Department of the Interior.

CONSTRUCTION, REPAIR, AND PRESERVATION OF CERTAIN PUBLIC WORKS—AMENDMENT

Mr. MAYBANK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 5472) authorizing the construction, repair, and preservtion of certain public works on rivers and harbors for navigation, flood control, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL HOUSING ACT—AMENDMENTS

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I submit for appropriate reference amendments intended to be proposed by me to the bill (S. 2246) to amend the National Housing Act, as amended, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that a summary of the amendments, prepared by me, may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table, and, without objection, the summary presented by the Senator from South Carolina will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The summary is as follows:

JANUARY 11, 1950.

SUMMARY BY SENATOR MAYBANK ON PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO S. 2246, RELATING TO THE NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

CHANGES IN TITLE I OF THE NATIONAL HOUSING ACT (EXTENSION OF INSURANCE PROGRAM FOR MODERNIZATION AND REPAIR LOANS)

Amendment 1 would extend on a permanent basis the program for insurance of modernization and repair loans under title I of the National Housing Act. Up to the present time this program has operated on the basis of a series of extensions by the Congress, and under existing law would expire on March 1, 1950. Under S. 2246 (sec. 101), as reported by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, the program would have been extended until July 1, 1952. Under this amendment 1, each financial institution participating in the program would, as in the past, build up an insurance reserve representing 10 percent of the amount of its title I loans and advances of credit, which would constitute the extent of the Government's maximum insurance liability to the institution. However, after a reserve is built up over a 30-month period under the amendment, one-fifth of the reserve would be cut back at the expiration of each 6-month period, beginning January 1, 1953. For administrative convenience, all these reserve cutbacks would be made on July 1, and January 1 of each year. This amendment would become effective March 1, 1950.

Amendment 2 would provide that the new maximum authorization for the title I modernization and repair loan program provided in S. 2246 would not become effective until March 1, 1950. This would make the effective date of such authorization consistent with the effective date of amendment 1.

Amendment 3 would reduce (from $5,000,000 to $1,000,000) the initial amount provided for the title I housing insurance fund under section 8 of S. 2246. That fund would constitute a revolving fund for carrying out the mortgage insurance program for very low-cost homes under section 8, particularly in suburban and outlying areas.

CHANGES IN TITLE II OF THE NATIONAL HOUSING ACT (INCREASED AUTHORIZATION AND RENTAL-HOUSING AMENDMENTS)

Amendment 4 would increase the mortgage-insurance authorization under title II of the National Housing Act by $1,250,000,000 immediately, and by an additional $1,500,000,000 upon the approval of the President. The present provisions of S. 2246 (in sec. 103 of the bill) have become obsolete by virtue of the enactment of Public Law 387 on October 25, 1949, and the passage of time.

Amendment 5 would make certain changes in section 207 of the National Housing Act in order to provide a better method for the insurance of mortgages on rental-housing projects on the basis of permanent legislative authorization, as distinguished from the emergency temporary rental-housing program under section 608, which is due to expire on March 1, 1950.

At the present time the amount of a rental-housing mortgage insured under section 207 may not exceed 80 percent of the value of the property, and such mortgage may not exceed $8,100 per family unit, except that in the case of certain mortgages on housing of cooperatives this dollar limitation may be $1,800 per room. Amendment 5 would substitute the following schedule of ratios of maximum loan to value: Not to exceed the sum of 90 percent of the first $7,000 value per family unit and 60 percent of the value in excess of $7,000 and not in excess of $10,000 per family unit. The $8,100 per family unit maximum in section 207 would be retained, except that this dollar limitation would be $7,500 per family unit if the number of rooms in the project does not equal or exceed four and one-half per family unit. This exception is designed to encourage the production of rental accommodations of adequate size for families with children. (These maximums in sec. 207 may be compared to the mortgage ceilings of $8,100 per family unit and 90 percent of necessary current cost under sec. 608.) Special mortgage insurance ceilings would be provided for Alaska in view of the higher costs and other conditions peculiar to that Territory.

The amendment would expressly state that the insurance of mortgages under section 207 is intended to facilitate particularly the production of rental accommodations of design and size suitable for family living and at rents within the means of families of moderate income. The Federal Housing Commissioner would be directed to take action which would make the benefits of mortgage insurance under this section available primarily to projects making adequate provision for families with children and in which every effort has been made to achieve moderate rental charges. The amendment would impose penalty provisions (similar to those applicable to sec. 608 housing) for discriminating against families with children in the selection of tenants.

This amendment would also change section 207 (d) of the National Housing Act to increase the maximum FHA charges for appraisal and inspection fees under section 207 from one-half of 1 percent to 1 percent.

Amendment 6 would make certain technical changes in section 207 with respect to foreclosure in the event of mortgage default.

Amendment 7 is technical.

Amendment 11 would make section 608 expire at the time of the enactment of S. 2246 instead of the present expiration date of March 1, 1950.

READJUSTMENT OF POSTAL RATES—RECOMMITTAL OF BILL

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 1103) to readjust postal rates be taken from the calendar and recommitted to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SUGGESTED USE OF NATIONAL EMERGENCY PROVISIONS OF LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I submit a concurrent resolution on behalf of myself, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MARTIN], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], and the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER].

The sponsors of the concurrent resolution have concluded that there is persuasive evidence that the growing strike in the coal industry, if permitted to continue, will impair the national health and safety. We cite the existence on the statute books of a law authorizing the President of the United States to act in such circumstances to protect the national health and safety.

The concurrent resolution would be advisory to the President. The Senate of the United States, with the House concurring, should adopt the resolution advising the President that it is the sense of the Congress that in view of existing circumstances the President should invoke the national emergency provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947.

On nine previous occasions the President has employed these provisions, which are sections 206 to 210 of the act. Those sections set forth the steps which the President may take when, in his opinion, a threatened or actual strike, if permitted to continue, will imperil the national health or safety:

First. He appoints a board of inquiry to inquire into the issues involved and make a written report to him. He may limit the time for the board's consideration and he has, in the past, required such reports within the matter of a very few days.

Second. Upon receiving a report from the board of inquiry, he may direct the Attorney General to seek an injunction.

In three of the nine occasions upon which the President has in the past invoked these national emergency sections the dispute was settled without the necessity of seeking an injunction.

The nine cases in which the President has invoked the emergency sections are as follows:

First. Atomic energy—injunction issued.

Second. Meat packing — Emergency board created and made its report, but no injunction was sought.

Third. First coal strike—injunction issued.

Fourth. Second coal strike—strike called off before petition for injunction was sought.

Fifth. Long-lines telephone—Emergency board created, but strike was settled without the board considering the case.

Sixth. Maritime, first east-coast strike—injunction issued.

Seventh. Maritime, west coast—injunction issued.

Eighth. Maritime, Great Lakes—injunction issued.

Ninth. Maritime, second east-coast strike—injunction issued.

I send the concurrent resolution to the desk for appropriate reference.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 68), was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, as follows:

Whereas there is persuasive and compelling evidence that the current strike in the coal industry will, if permitted to continue, imperil the national health and safety; and

Whereas there already exists legislation authorizing the President to act under such circumstances to protect the national health and safety: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the President of the United States should invoke the national emergency provisions (secs. 206 to 210, inclusive) of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, in the current strike in the coal industry.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. MAYBANK submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 208), which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking ing and Currency hereby is authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate, during the Eighty-first Congress, $10,000 in addition to the amount, and for the same purposes, specified in section 134 (a) of the Legislative Reorganization Act approved August 2, 1946, as increased by Senate Resolution 175, Eighty-first Congress, agreed to October 13, 1949.

FLOOD PERIL AT VINCENNES, IND.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement which I have prepared dealing with flood conditions at Vincennes, Ind., and I also ask to have printed in the body of the RECORD an article entitled "Vincennes Peril Grows," written by Jep Cadou, Jr., published in the Indianapolis Star of January 9, 1950.

There being no objection, the statement and the article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CAPEHART

Mr. President, at this moment the citizens of that historic city of Vincennes, Ind., are hoping and praying that an unfinished flood-prevention project holds off the raging waters of the Wabash River.

At this moment, Mr. President, the citizens of Vincennes are in deathly fear of the catastrophe they hoped would be prevented by a flood wall for which they have pleaded for years.

I am sure that every Member of the Senate has been reading of the disastrous Indiana floods and the great danger to Vincennes.

The crest of the Wabash flood is expected today or tomorrow.

Whether the short and completely inadequate flood wall around Vincennes will hold is a matter of conjecture.

Vincennes suffered heavy damage from floods in 1943 and in 1945.

I was there and watched Vincennes fight for its life in 1943.

Only because wartime troops stationed near Vincennes were rushed into the city to help bulwark its defenses against the floodwaters was the city saved.

In 1945 more damage came to the city, and in 1946 the Congress heeded our pleas for help and authorized a new and larger and safer flood wall.

While that was pending in the budget another flood hit Vincennes and finally the Congress appropriated $40,000 for planning a new flood wall with authorization to spend $360,000 for building the wall this year.

I appeared before the Appropriations Committee of the Senate last April and pleaded that the appropriation be made so that work could start at once.

I am fully familiar with the Vincennes problem and I greatly feared the very thing that is happening today in Vincennes.

In my testimony before the committee I said:

"This, to my mind, is an emergency because these floods in the Wabash River simply will not wait; and if we have a really bad flood and a lot of high water, we are going to lose literally tens and tens of thousands of dollars' worth of property. We are going to lose a lot of levees."

Mr. President, I gave this warning to the committee:

"I am fearful even now that we will lose the whole thing before it can be finished."

You see, Mr. President, I live along the White River just about 20 miles away, and I am quite familiar with what happens when the Wabash River goes on a rampage.

The fears I expressed for the safety of Vincennes less than a year ago were not unfounded.

If the Congress a year ago could have taken a meager $360,000 out of the billions and billions of dollars that were sent overseas the people of Vincennes would not today be in danger.

We have been penny-wise and pound-foolish in many ways, Mr. President, and this instance is certainly one of them.

For the last several days nearly 1,000 troops from Fort Knox, Ky., have been helping the Vincennes volunteers in the battle to save the city that was the first capital of the great Northwest Territory.

Thousands upon thousands of dollars are being spent to bolster that wholly inadequate flood wall.

Thousands upon thousands of dollars are l. ing lost in property because levees above and below the city have been broken in order to save the city.

And yet today we are not sure that the city of Vincennes will not be wiped out along with many other levees along the river.

I think, Mr. President, that in this session of the Congress we could well give more attention to our own people before we spend weeks and months of our time perfecting ways and means of pouring more billions of dollars into foreign lands.

[From the Indianapolis Star of January 9, 1950]

VINCENNES PERIL GROWS—SANDBAGS RUSHED AS RIVER THREATENS TO OVERFLOW LEVEE

(By Jep Cadou, Jr.)

Troops and volunteers frantically sandbagged the Vincennes sea wall last night in preparation for the highest flood crest in the city's history—expected to reach within inches of the top of the wall.

As the rising Wabash River reached 26.15 feet there yesterday, the Weather Bureau revised upward a previous estimate of a 28-foot crest.

The river probably will go over 28 feet and perhaps almost to 29 late Wednesday or early Thursday, said Paul A. Miller, chief meteorologist at the Indianapolis Weather Bureau.

The wall is 29 feet high. Army engineers said troops from Fort Knox, Ky., may be ordered momentarily to begin construction of mud boxes atop the wall to safeguard the city.

Meantime, 30 miles north, a crumbling dirt levee was expected to wash out momentarily and flood 5,500 acres of farm land. Authorities gave up an attempt to save the levee by sandbagging.

Graysville, a small Sullivan County community 5 miles east of the expected levee break, was evacuated and Indiana 154 was blocked by Indiana State police.

On the Illinois shore of the Wabash River, opposite the weakened levee, Illinois State police closed the Hudsonville bridge.

Indiana State Police Superintendent Arthur M. Thurston expressed fear some sightseers attracted to the area might have remained and could be in danger.

State police said a shift in wind or the flood crest, due within 48 hours near Graysville, could wash out the levee. If the break occurs, a slightly lower crest would occur at Vincennes.

With the level of the Wabash behind the levee higher than the downtown business section, water began pouring up through sewer openings on downtown streets. Evening services at the First Methodist Church were cut short so that the congregation could leave before water, already running-board deep, became too high for driving.

The Niblack levee, nine miles north of Vincennes, broke through at 9:20 p. m., flooding 16,000 acres of bottomland, State police reported. There were no casualties.

U S 50 between Vincennes and Lawrenceville, Ill., was closed by high water yesterday.

Some 970 troops and 200 volunteers were filling and stacking sandbags last night.

REPEAL OF EXCISE TAXES—STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement I prepared this morning entitled "Excise Taxes Should Be Repealed Right Now Simultaneously With Dairy Amendment to Oleomargarine Bill."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

EXCISE TAXES SHOULD BE REPEALED RIGHT NOW SIMULTANEOUSLY WITH DAIRY AMENDMENT TO OLEOMARGARINE BILL

Mr. President, yesterday I attached, on behalf of myself and cosponsor of the Gillette-Wiley amendment to the oleomargarine bill, the Butler-Johnson amendment for reduction of the wartime rates of many nuisance excise taxes. Unfortunately, there has been a certain amount of confusion on this question interjected into the discussion by the oleo lobby, and I should like to set forth below, in a few points, the issue as we see it:

1. We have provided to the American consumer a golden opportunity to repeal excise taxes right now instead of waiting for some mythical tomorrow, when the administration may deign to bring up the excise-tax issue. We notice that the opposition is frantically promising to bring up excise taxes sometime during the session. In the meantime, however, it is simply stating a fact that the administration will be bombarding Congress with requests to spend $42,000,000,000 and more money, and even increase the prospective $5,000,000,000 deficit. In other words, as time goes on, the administration hopes to embarrass the Congress so much, by its requests for appropriations, that the promise of excise-tax repeal will more and more fade into the background.

2. The Senators who have agreed to a one-package excise-tax repeal—dairy substitute amendment—did so in sincere support of excise-tax relief. In other words, we firmly believe, as our able colleague, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] said yesterday, that the time is long overdue to cut the tax on transportation of persons from 15 to 10 percent; on local telephone calls from 15 to 10 percent; on luggage to eliminate completely the retailers' excise tax of 20 percent, replacing it only by the previous manufacturers' tax of 10 percent. We believe that the time is overdue to cut the wartime rate on admissions.

The opposition has attempted to smear our effort and to imply that we are simply trying to kill oleo legislation. That, Mr. President, I respectfully submit is a downright misstatement and misinterpretation of fact. We want some form of oleo legislation to pass, and we want it to pass with excise-tax repeal. We want the dairy substitute amendment to be voted simultaneously with excise-tax relief.

I say to my colleagues who announce that they will try to strike the excise-tax provisions from the dairy amendment:

You are unwittingly fooling yourselves and fooling the people in leading them to believe that—

(a) The people will ever get excise-tax relief unless it is voted immediately, or

(b) A real friend of the 2,250,000 dairy farmers can simultaneously vote for the dairy amendment but vote to strike out the excise-tax amendment.

The dairy farmers of America are not fools. They recognize that a one-package dairy substitute excise-tax bill provides the greatest hope for American agriculture and for the American consumer simultaneously.

I urge every American voter, who wants his excise-tax burden relieved, to urge his Senator to vote to retain the one-package approach, rather than to split it.

PROPOSED RESUMPTION OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH SPAIN—STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a statement which I have prepared urging that the United States send an Ambassador back to Madrid to resume normal diplomatic relations with the Spanish Government. I ask unanimous consent that the text of this statement be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SHOULD RESUME RELATIONS WITH SPAIN THROUGH AN AMBASSADOR AT MADRID

It has been my firm belief that the best interests of the United States and of world freedom and peace would be served by arranging for the return of an American Ambassador to Madrid to resume normal relations with the Spanish Government.

There is quite a bit of confusion by some folks on this point. In order to be positively sure, in turn, about my own facts, some 3 months ago, I addressed an inquiry to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to secure the background of this problem. On the basis of the answer which I received and further inquiries which I have conducted, I should like to state the following:

WE DO RIGHT NOW HAVE BUSINESS WITH MADRID

1. It would be inaccurate to say that the United States does not recognize General Franco's government. Actually we have an Embassy at Madrid which is under the supervision of a chargé d'affaires, and we continue to do business with the Spanish Government, but not through an Ambassador.

2. We have not had an Ambassador there for several years. This is due largely to the fact that in 1946 the General Assembly of the United Nations passed a resolution recommending to the members of the United Nations that their Ambassadors to Madrid be withdrawn. Even then, our Ambassador was not at his post in Madrid and since then we have not returned him to his duties there.

3. Prior to that, at the San Francisco Conference a resolution was passed to the effect that Spain should not be permitted to participate in the work of the UN as long as General Franco headed the Government.

BIPARTISAN SUPPORT OF RESUMING RELATIONS

4. The fact that leading American legislators believe that the time is long overdue to change America's policy is indicated by the following: Both Senators CONNALLY and VANDENBERG have expressed the view that it is, for example, completely inconsistent for us to have an Ambassador in hostile Moscow and not one in anti-Communist Madrid. We also note that the chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Congressman KEE, has now also recommended steps toward a resumption of ambassadorial relations with the Madrid government.

UN RESOLUTION NOT BINDING

5. I should like to point out that in December 1949, at a press conference, Senator CONNALLY stated his belief that the resolution adopted by the UN General Assembly "was not necessarily binding on the United States." He further stated that "it was simply a persuasive resolution recommending to the country that they do this." Senator CONNALLY then went on to emphasize the advantages of having an Ambassador at Madrid, and I will set them forth now.

SPAIN HAS VITAL SIGNIFICANCE TO WESTERN PLANS

6. No one disputes the fact that if an American Ambassador represents our interests there, he can look after the needs of our citizens, serve as a listening post, conduct high-level talks, if necessary with Spanish officials, report to our Government on trends in that area of Europe and elsewhere, etc. This is wholly aside from the question of the present status of our fight against communism throughout the globe.

7. But now, at this point, let us add the crucial fact that we are engaged in a cold war with the anti-Christian and revolutionary conspiracy of the Soviet Union. We have poured untold billions of dollars since the end of the war into Europe to stop communism. We are right now pouring a billion dollars of arms into the western European countries. We are not being choosy about the politics of some of our friends, because we have no alternative but to side with those who sincerely oppose communism.

We sent military missions to Greece although we had doubts about some of our friends there; but we had no doubts about the murderous Greek Communists who were destroying that unhappy little land. We are pouring economic and other aid to Red-turncoat Marshal Tito, although the memory is still fresh in our mind that he was blithely shooting down American airmen but a few years ago.

FEW NATIONS ENJOY AMERICAN-STYLE LIBERTIES

The Portuguese Government is a party to the North Atlantic Treaty, although her people do not enjoy the rights that our own people do. In fact, if we were to withdraw our ambassadors from every country whose people do not enjoy American-style civil liberties, we would have an army of unemployed American envoys, including United States diplomats from every country behind the iron curtain.

We thus see that a realistic view of the situation requires that we utilize every instrument available in our fight against communism or else we will simply be cutting off our nose to spite our face. We will be failing to fully recognize General Franco's government because of some obsolete decisions made by the UN which are by no means binding.

SPAIN'S INTERNAL AFFAIRS ARE SPAIN'S BUSINESS

8. To return our Ambassador to Spain does not mean that we approve of the Madrid government's policies any more than we necessarily approve any other government's policies. Spanish internal affairs are the business of the Spanish people themselves. No one disputes the fact that General Franco is now, always has been, and always will be a powerful opponent of communism. The position of Spain at Gibraltar and at the Pyrenees is of obvious military importance in future operations.

To return our Ambassador to Madrid does not mean, of course, that we are committed to defending western Europe only at the Pyrenees (as against defending it at the Rhine.)

The Madrid government is stable. It possesses all the qualities of a state, and it is ridiculously inconsistent for us to pursue a policy which is now completely outdated, which is not doing us any good, the devout Spanish people any good, or western Europe any good, but which is only helping our common foe—the brutal Communist clique in the Kremlin.

CONCLUSION

I, therefore, urge the President and his Secretary of State to reconsider their policy and to change it in the light of present-day realities. I urge them to make the strongest possible representations accordingly to the United Nations.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY], inserting certain language after line 10, on page 4 of the original bill.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I rise to support the Gillette-Wiley substitute to H. R. 2023. Because I am convinced that removal of restrictions relating to oleomargarine colored yellow in imitation of butter would have a serious adverse effect on the dairy industry, and eventually the entire agricultural economy, I have joined with a group of 25 Senators in sponsoring this amendment in the nature of a substitute to House bill 2023. The amendment would repeal the Federal taxes on oleomargarine, but would make unlawful the manufacture, transportation, or sale of yellow oleomargarine in interstate commerce. This measure is along the lines I believe necessary as a fair safeguard to consumers and producers of both dairy products and substitutes.

Yellow oleomargarine manufactured or colored within the borders of a State or Territory in which it is consumed would not be subject to the provisions of the proposed act, but would be subject to the laws and regulations of the State or Territory. The application of Federal pure-food laws would not be limited by the act, and the enforcement provisions of those laws are specifically cited in connection with the new provisions to be administered by the Administrator of the Federal Security Agency.

In all areas except those adjacent to large metropolitan centers, the dairy producer is dependent on the butter market. The dairy farm lends itself to the most practical type of diversified farming. It is a family-type farm operation, and that is just what we are trying to continue in America, with its individual ownership, individual management, and individual opportunity for the children of a family to assist in the farm work.

We have appropriated hundreds of millions of dollars for soil conservation and soil-building practices. Butterfat comes from dairy farms which, with their acres of pasture lands and legumes, build the soil. A large percentage of oleomargarine is processed from vegetable oils produced from row-crop operations, such as soybean and cotton production, which deplete the soil.

Even in the South, progressive agriculturists have endeavored to establish livestock and diversified farm management in the development of family-type farms. If we now yield to the great pressure of a few large processors of oleomargarine, some of whom are internationally involved—a pressure aided by the Cotton Council—we shall be taking a step backward in respect to the continuance and growth of family farms in this Nation.

I wish to call the attention of Senators to some of the previous statements which have been made not only by my colleague the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] but also by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] and other Senators, who have called specific attention to the international cartels and international organizations which are hoping to engage or which are engaged in the processing of oleomargarine.

Mr. President, it was just a few years ago that a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Agriculture attended a hearing at Memphis, Tenn.; and from Memphis we went to Muscle Shoals. While we were examining that plant and the TVA development, some of the soil conservationists took us into the countryside and showed us some farms which had been eroded by row-crop operations in years past. Then they showed us another farm, one of several hundred acres. "This farm, as you see it now, is a much better looking farm unit than it was when we first commenced to work on it a few years ago," they said. "This particular farm you now look upon was as badly eroded as some of the fields you see over on yonder hillside. And nothing very much other than weeds and brush were growing on that long general slope that you are now looking at."

We were on the roadside, looking up over more than half a mile of general slope, and it was then beautifully terraced, and grass was growing on it. Herds of dairy cattle could be seen grazing over the general slope of that countryside, and we saw some excellent, well-improved farm buildings. It was a unit which had been developed or created on land which had been so badly eroded that only a short time before it had been laid aside as useless or waste land. Yet by its rebirth, so to speak, the contouring and reestablishment of grass on the land, and the establishment of a dairy herd, the operators of that farm were bringing about a production from land which at one time had been laid aside as useless. The dairy cow fitted into the picture there. Without the aid of the dairy cow, it would have been useless, and an utter waste of time, for the operators of that farm to attempt to reestablish the fertility of the soil by means of the use of commercial fertilizers and the contouring of the land, because unless the land is tied down with a grass crop, it will erode again as soon as the rains come. But with the grass crop and the hay lands or meadowlands which were furnishing dry legumes and feed for the dairy cows, the operators of the farm were establishing a very profitable unit.

I have cited that case to show how the dairy cow fitted into the picture for the reclamation of some badly eroded land in the vicinity of Muscle Shoals or TVA, in the section of the country from which the President pro tempore of the Senate comes. I could cite many other projects—for instance, some in Arkansas, in Mississippi, and elsewhere in the South—where such reclamation projects or operations involving the reclamation of badly eroded lands have been developed, and where the family type of farm and the dairy are now providing prosperity, opportunity, and hope to the individual farmer or individual family man.

I can cite instances of family men coming before the committee at that hearing and telling how well they were progressing now that they had introduced the diversified type of farming, had ceased growing row crops, and were engaged in animal husbandry or in the care of dairy cows. That necessarily meant that there was a creamery adjacent to that particular farm unit or farm operator's location, in order that he would be able to dispose of the butterfat produced on his farm, because unless such a farm operator is located very close to a large, metropolitan milk-consuming area, he is dependent upon the processor of butter to process the commodity or product of his farm into a salable product.

I have cited these instances in order that we may better appreciate what we shall be confronted with if we take such action as will permit a synthetic product to take the market of a genuine product like butter.

By destroying the butter market we may help a few large processors of the substitutes, but we shall put out of business thousands of small creameries all over the land. There are 348 cooperative creameries and 146 independent creameries in Minnesota alone. These creameries serve the thousands of individual farmers residing in our State who have no fluid-milk market.

The eastern markets are closed to these farmers by the milk-marketing control legislation, which protects the producers in areas adjacent to our great metropolitan centers. I myself could not bring a can of milk into the Washington market this morning, in competition with the milk sent into the Washington market by the producers who operate in this area. I could not do so even if I desired, and even though the milk would qualify as grade A milk, because there is a milk board which has control of this market, as well as of the markets in Baltimore, Philadelphia, and the other Atlantic seaboard cities. For that reason the milk produced in the Midwest in the diversified-farming areas must be separated, the butterfat must be churned, and the butter must then have a market. If oleomargarine takes over that market, what are we going to do with the milk we produce in areas where we do not have a large milk-consuming population or a large milk-consuming market to which to sell our milk?

There are more than 3,500 creameries in this country, employing about 40,000 people. There are only 26 oleo manufacturers, and, according to their own admission, their work force at the present amounts to only 4,619 persons. Thus, 10 times as many workers in dairy plants alone would face cuts in salary or possible lay-offs as a result of the serious blow to the dairy industry which the repeal of regulations on oleo, as contemplated by House bill 2023, is certain to cause.

Union leaders are alive to the danger facing the skilled workers in dairy plants all over the country. Many have telegraphed me concerning the matter.

Ray Johnson, business agent of the Milk Drivers and Dairy Employees Local No. 32, at Duluth, Minn., has sent me the following:

> Our union is definitely on record opposed to the coloring of oleo.

Gene Larson, of Minneapolis, chairman of the International Conference of Dairy Employees, affiliated with the AFL, asks for delay in considering the present legislation, so that his union organization could have time "to prepare ourselves to be in the best possible position to defeat legislation sponsored by the oleo interests."

Eugene R. Hubbard, vice chairman of this group of employees, has sent various Senators the following telegram.

> International Conference of Dairy Employees, Division of International Teamsters Union, affiliate of American Federation of Labor, representing more than 100,000 union employees in dairy plants of the Nation respectfully urges your support of Gillette-Wiley amendment to H. R. 2023, now on Senator Calendar. It repeals oleo taxes but protects consumers and dairy industry from imitation of yellow butter, in interstate commerce.

Now, Mr. President, what is the main argument on this question? It has been heard in this legislative Chamber time and again for the past half century. The whole argument involves the restriction on color. Despite all the propaganda that has been circulated, there has been wisdom in the continued restriction of the sale of oleomargarine when camouflaged to resemble butter in every detail. Color restriction does not deny the consumer a food product, nor does it impose a financial burden on anyone. Color adds nothing to the food value of oleomargarine.

The simple fact is that the processors of oleomargarine are attempting to duplicate butter to the last degree. They have, already, successfully incorporated the flavor of butter into the substitute product. They have made oleomargarine resemble butter in texture by adding preservatives. They have packed the oleomargarine in packages made to resemble butter cartons, even to the extent of putting farm scenes and pictures of dairy cattle on them and displaying the word "butter." If they are now allowed to color oleomargarine without restriction, they will have duplicated butter in every detail. There can be only one reason for all this. It is all for the purpose of benefiting from the age-old consumer habit of using butter.

Oleomargarine is not entitled to the yellow color. They claim that oleo has as much right as butter to the yellow color is false. Oleo in this country is largely produced from the oils of cottonseed and soybean. The oleo industry claims it must bleach these oils white because of Federal laws. The real reason is that when cottonseed oils are turned into fat they become grey, and when soybean oils are turned into fat they become green. In order to have a uniform color the oleo manufacturers must bleach out the grey and green colors. It is impossible to produce a natural yellow oleomargarine from domestic oils.

Butter, on the other hand, is always yellow—although at some seasons of the year it is less yellow than at others. That could be explained in this manner: If cattle are on green pasture, the milk itself will have a yellow tint, and the butterfat definitely will come out quite yellow. If the cattle are on dry feed and have been confined to the barnyard or within buildings, as they must be in the winter months, the butterfat then will not be so yellow. In order to have uniformity, there has been a practice of yellowing the butter, so that the season will make no difference in the shade of yellow when the butter is processed. When color is added to butter it is for the sake of uniformity—not for the purpose of making it look like some other product.

Mr. President, in considering the proposals now before the Senate, H. R. 2023, as reported by the committee, and the substitute sponsored by 25 Senators, we are agreed that the present Federal tax of one-fourth cent a pound on uncolored oleomargarine and 10 cents a pound on the colored product, as well as the manufacturers', wholesalers', and retailers' fees and taxes should be removed. We agree on this simply as a matter of Federal tax policy, but we ought not to be misled by false propaganda which a well-financed lobby has circulated that the 9¾ cents added tax on the colored product has worked a hardship or added an expense to the consumer. The 9¾ cents is assessed only against the colored product. When the product is purchased uncolored, the tax is not imposed.

As for the consumer, no one pays the 10-cent tax unless he purchases yellow oleo. The old contention that the home-coloring of oleo is tedious and wasteful no longer holds water. Modern packaging enables a housewife who wants yellow oleomargarine to color it very easily, quickly, and without waste. I may explain why I say that. A small capsule of coloring matter is placed in a 1-pound package of oleomargarine, and all the housewife has to do is to squeeze the pack a few times. The capsule bursts and the coloring matter spreads through the oleomargarine, after which the housewife breaks the pack. In this manner the oleo is as beautifully colored as the processor himself could possibly make it, and the housewife is not required to pay the tax of 9¾ cents.

I may further say that, once the processor is given the unrestricted right to color the product, without an additional tax because of the coloring, the housewife will pay dearly for the product. The makers of oleo, by reason of its imitating butter, will then bring their price up to about the price of butter, and it will remain there so long as they can find a market. Of course, they will find a market, if the product looks like butter, smells like butter, has the texture of butter, and is branded as butter.

Furthermore, oleomargarine already has been given competitive privileges which are denied to butter. It may be flavored with butter flavor and preserved with a preservative. Neither of these—nor any other extraneous substances—may be added to butter.

Yet, the basic purpose of the 10-cent tax on oleomargarine colored yellow in imitation of butter is not to tax one food to protect the market of another. Its purpose is intended to protect the consumer, just as our pure-food laws are intended to do, against adulteration and substitution. Fundamentally, there is no restrictive tax on oleomargarine except when it masquerades as butter.

Other imitations of good butter are taxed; why should oleo be exempted? Adulterated butter—which, like oleo, is an imitation of good butter—carries the same per pound tax and the same manufacturers', wholesalers', and retailers' occupational taxes as does colored oleo. There is no reason why an exception should be made for oleomargarine. Or do the proponents of removing all Federal restrictions on yellow oleomargarine intend to come forward with a repeal of the taxes on adulterated or reprocessed butter? Senators have never heard it mentioned. Would such action be in the public interest? The answer, of course, is "No."

It is my prediction that repeal of the present laws, as contemplated by H. R. 2023, would prove costly to the consumers.

Already in the city of Washington, for example, colored oleo has sold on the same day at from 14 to 20 cents a pound more than uncolored brands. A recent national survey shows that in cities where yellow oleo may be sold, its price ranges as much as 30 cents more a pound than white oleo. The average mark-up in nine cities was 21.8 cents a pound. The tax is only 10 cents a pound. It is a product that carries only a tax of 9¾ cents, provided it is colored. Yet, when it is marketed after being colored, and is sold where permitted to be sold, in such States as do not have regulations on the subject, it will oftentimes carry a price, when colored, of as much as 30 cents a pound more, when in reality the tax imposed is only 9¾ cents a pound.

Who gets that exorbitant overcharge? It certainly is not the farmer. No, Mr. President, I assure you that farmers never see a penny of that extra money the consumer pays.

And what will happen to the price of oleo if the present laws are repealed? The production of colored oleo could be expected virtually to displace uncolored oleo. There would be nothing to prevent the colored product from being sold at substantially higher prices than the uncolored—with little or none of the uncolored available. How would that help the consumer?

The touching concern of the oleomargarine interests for the consumer, aided by certain metropolitan newspapers, which have been misled by the so-called housewives' revolt, is about as synthetic as the product they would exploit at the expense of our dairy industry.

The American housewife is being fooled in this fight. Another segment of the public, restaurant patrons, are likely to be fooled, too. In the event all Federal taxes are removed and there are no restrictions on how oleomargarine is to be marketed, it will be used in restaurants where some 60,000,000 meals are served daily. The sponsors of H. R. 2023 propose that the pats of oleomargarine served in public eating places be triangular in shape. By "pats" I refer to the familiar servings of individual portions of butter or oleomargarine on a small dish. The oleomargarine used in a sandwich, of course, would lose its identifying triangular shape, and served in half-pounds or quarter-pounds in a dish on a table it would not have its triangular shape. Very few people would examine the walls of a public eating place for a sign to indicate that they were being served oleomargarine. That, of course, is what House bill 2023 proposes to do. It proposes that there shall be a sign in the restaurant saying, "We serve oleomargarine here." The oleomargarine would have to be served in a small triangular pat to indicate that it was not butter.

If House bill 2023 is allowed to pass, oleomargarine will enjoy every marketing advantage of butter, and the age-old taste for butter is in the market that the processor of oleomargarine is striving to capture.

The processor of oleomargarine contends that he has successfully incorporated all of the food and nutritive values of butter in oleomargarine. This question, of course, could be debated at great length. Speaking from my own experience, I know we cannot successfully raise a calf by extracting from the milk all the butterfat and substituting other fats in the same quantity. In nearly all such cases the calf will die. There have been scientific experiments made by some of the leading dairy specialists of the Nation, and their experiments have also proved this to be true.

In a radio broadcast on January 2 of this year, Dr. William E. Petersen, professor of dairy husbandry in the Agricultural College of the University of Minnesota, described experiments conducted at the Minnesota station by Dr. Gullickson.

I know both those gentlemen very well, and I know that Dr. Petersen is one of the greatest dairy specialists and one of the greatest students of the dairy cow in the entire United States.

In this radio broadcast Dr. Petersen described experiments conducted at the Minnesota station by Dr. Gullickson, where various fats have been emulsified into skim milk including butterfat after being taken out of the milk and reemulsified into the skim milk. These various fats put into skim milk—such as butter oil and corn oil, soybean oil, peanut oil, hydrogenated vegetable oil and animal fats such as lard and tallow—have been compared for rates of growth and general well-being of the calves over a period of many years.

What were the results?

Dr. Petersen replied to that question in these words:

> The results have been rather striking. It is proven that there is something in butterfat that is not found in any of the other fats because the calves on butterfat have done so much better than those getting an equivalent of other animal fats, but the most striking results of these experiments has been the observation of the vegetable fats when emulsified into skim milk and to resemble whole milk have been toxic to calves. As a matter of fact, all calves on such diets have died, while those that received the butterfat emulsified back into skim milk did as well as those that received whole milk.

Those are remarks of Dr. Petersen, the great dairy specialist of the University of Minnesota.

The scientist added that the experiments have not yet revealed what it is in butterfat that makes it superior to other fats. "There are certain things we have eliminated," he stated. "For instance, vitamin deficiency is not the factor as the addition of all known vitamins to these calves failed to prevent the onset of the disastrous symptoms."

I have heard the question asked—in fact, the same question has been asked of me—"Why the contention, if you cannot detect the difference in taste between oleomargarine and butter?" That question was asked me in a Senate subcommittee hearing a year ago, and I simply answered in this manner: "You cannot detect strychnine in milk by the taste, but certainly your stomach will know the difference. Likewise, you cannot detect the difference between butter and oleomargarine as it is now processed, but your stomach will soon detect it, as there are certain oils which can be used in the making of oleomargarine which the body cannot assimilate in the same manner as it assimilates butterfat."

At this point, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a letter which I recently received from Mr. Henry J. Hoffman, chief chemist of the Minnesota Department of Agriculture, Dairy and Food, who has had wide experience in the problem of enforcement of food laws. I personally served as deputy commissioner of agriculture in Minnesota and had charge of enforcement of the food laws, so that I can speak from personal experience as well as quote Mr. Hoffman's letter.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF MINNESOTA, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, DAIRY AND FOOD

Senator E. J. THYE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR THYE: At the request of the Minnesota Dairy Industries Committee, the writer would like to point out the following facts in the butter versus oleomargarine controversy which is now raging.

1. The State dairy commission was originally created in 1885 for the sole purpose of regulating oleomargarine. At that time, oleomargarine was being freely sold in imitation of butter, and the great bulk of oleomargarine sales were as yellow oleomargarine, palmed off as butter. The legislature saw the need of a law which would enable the public to readily differentiate between butter and oleomargarine. Hence, the law was passed prohibiting the coloring of oleomargarine, and this department (then called the Minnesota Dairy Commission) was created to enforce the law.

2. Butter has always demanded a higher price than oleomargarine, and since the public is willing to pay this higher price, they are entitled to reasonable protection to insure that they get the product that they pay for. The public's protection is the distinguishing color between white oleomargarine and yellow butter. The housewife who complains about the effort used to color her oleomargarine yellow at home would be the first one to complain if she paid the price for genuine butter and received yellow oleomargarine. Experts—chemists, nutritionists, food officials, doctors, and the like—will have little difficulty detecting oleomargarine from butter even if both were yellow, but laws are not enacted for such experts, they are enacted to protect the everyday layman who, not being endowed with sufficient knowledge, is the one who will be defrauded. And such laymen are the great purchasing public, not the few experts.

3. The magnitude of enforcing the law and insuring people that butter was genuine, if yellow oleomargarine was permitted to be sold, would be so great and so expensive that the cost of administrative effort would be prohibitive.

4. There is no value, either nutritional or otherwise, to the color the oleomargarine manufacturers wish to add to their product. Its only purpose is to cause their product to resemble butter. Why do the oleomargarine manufacturers not direct the effort now expended seeking yellow oleomargarine to some worth-while project such as extolling the merits of their pure white product?

5. Most food manufacturers, including oleomargarine manufacturers, make an advertising point of calling to the public attention that their products are free from artificial color and flavor—yet here is a product which is free from such ingredient, yet the manufacturer wishes legislation so that he can add them. How can such controversial ideas be reconciled?

Let it be further pointed out that butter manufacture is the cornerstone of the dairy industry, and that dairying is one of the most important functions of the American farmer. Our whole economic structure is based upon the products of the soil and the producers of such product—the farmer. To permit the wholesale defrauding of the American public in one of the key items of the diet—butter—will, without question, upset the price differential now existing between butter and oleomargarine, and conceivably upset our present economic picture still further. It is true that today the price of butter is high, but let us not forget that oleomagarine, too, has trebled in price. This is a fact which the oleomargarine manufacturers have spent considerable effort in soft pedaling. We should not be concerned so much with price in this controversy, as we should in price differential.

Lastly, it should be pointed out, American manufacturers are constantly extolling the individuality of their products, and through advertising seek to point out the distinguishing features of their products—yet here come the oleomargarine manufacturers who wish to submerge the identity of their product in the shadow of another. They are disinterested in making their product an individual unit, but, rather, would have it be an imitation. When such efforts are made, we should investigate them thoroughly, because, usually, fraud and deceit are coupled with such efforts.

Sincerely,

HENRY J. HOFFMAN,
Chief Chemist.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, what are the dangers to the agricultural economy of the United States if we lose the butter market to this synthetic product that looks like butter, tastes like butter, and is sold in cartons that have the appearance of butter cartons?

I hope each Senator will ask himself that question.

The dangers are far more serious than appear on the surface in what, in a narrow sense, is the proposed removal of an excise tax. Since butter accounts for 16 percent of all dairy cash income and is the outlet of 27 percent of all milk produced in this country, most of our dairy-farm leaders are convinced that loss of the vital butter market will mean an agricultural depression.

Certainly, the effect on an important segment of American agriculture will be very serious.

First, in the Midwest our diversified farm operation will be jeopardized. Without the butter market there is no outlet for the products of the dairy farm because, as I have stated before, the great metropolitan fluid-milk markets are closed as a result of existing legislation. The two and one-half million dairy-farm families would be injured in every State in the Union. There would be 40,000 milk-processing plants, and their employees that would be adversely affected. The eventual effect on dairying as a whole would be drastic and would lead to changes in our diversified agriculture.

One of the most serious results of this trend would be the effect on our soil resources by discouraging dairy farming, the most important contributor to sound soil conservation.

The dairy-farm movement has been extended into the South to reclaim land that has long ago been depleted of its top soil by constant row-crop operation. I have visited farms in many areas of the South where the dairy cow is now utilizing the legumes and pasture lands which are helping restore the soil. If we destroy the butter market by the pending legislation, we shall handicap the Extension Service and the Soil Conservation Service of the Department of Agriculture in their endeavors to introduce diversified farming in areas of the South where they have found it is not sound practice to continue to grow the row crops.

If legislation is enacted which does destroy the butter market, we are placing the huge holdings of butter of the Commodity Credit Corporation in a precarious position.

Mr. President, I hope my colleagues will pay strict attention to the holdings which the Commodity Credit Corporation now has of butter, cheese, and powdered milk.

In order to support butter prices in 1949, the Commodity Credit Corporation purchased 115,000,000 pounds of butter at an average cost of only 62 cents a pound. This represented a cost of $171,300,000, and the Commodity Credit Corporation, in order to further support dairy prices and to maintain dairy prices somewhere near 90 percent of parity, purchased 26,000,000 pounds of cheese at only 12½ cents per pound, and the total sum so expended was $8,255,000. If we destroy the butter market many of the farmers who are today engaged in growing legume crops and who have many good fertile acres of land in pasture will have to turn to raising another type of crop. That will greatly aggravate our surpluses of corn and wheat, but it will be agreed it will also aggravate the cotton problem in the South. We need only examine the figures to see that we do have a problem.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. THYE. I am most happy to yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. Would not the Senator like to point out that the dairy industry of this country, first, furnishes one of the largest single items of tonnage which the railroads and other means of transportation carry? They transport fertilizer to the farms, milk to the cities, and dairy products of all kinds. More important than all else is the transportation of grain to the dairy farmer. I do not know how much grain my small State now uses, but 10 years ago we were importing over 500,000 tons of grain annually into that one small State. When we multiply that by the amount of tonnage that moves over all our roads we can easily see what the effect would be of losing a considerable part of that tonnage. It would mean that a bad situation would be made very much worse, if not even desperate.

Mr. THYE. The very able Senator from Vermont is indeed correct when he says products of the dairy industry constitute one of the greatest sources of traffic which the railroads have an opportunity to transport.

Mr. AIKEN. I should like to point out also that it takes almost five times as much man-labor to make 1 pound of butter as it does to make 1 pound of oleo. When we consider the two or three million people who today are employed in the production of dairy products, who are employed the year around, 365 days of the year, and compare that labor with the seasonal labor which is required to produce oleomargarine, we can form some idea of what the effect will be on our labor supply and on the standard of living of our workers.

Mr. THYE. I thank the able Senator from Vermont for adding those facts to the discussion.

Mr. President, let us examine some of these surplus problems. In 1948 approximately 55,000,000 bushels of corn alone were placed under loan or purchase agreement. The support price was $1.44, which represents a commitment of approximately $821,400,000. It is impossible to state how much of this corn the Government now actually owns and how much is still under loan or will be resealed under some future loan. As of November 30, 1949, 19,235,372 bushels of the 1949 crop had been placed under loan or purchase agreement, involving a commitment of $26,929,000.

If we take a look at the cotton situation we find of the 1948 crop 5,271,772 bales were placed under loan. Of this, 1,490,772 bales were redeemed by the end of 1949, leaving 3,781,000 bales under Government ownership or commitment. The average support price in 1948 was $158 a bale. Thus there was a total investment of $597,398,000 in the 1948 crop as of December 31, 1949. That is surplus cotton that is held by the Commodity Credit Corporation, because there is no domestic demand or any exportable demand for it at the time.

What we need to do is to find some way of diverting some of these cotton acres to some other kind of crop, in order that we may not have the surplus problem in cotton as I have described it. If we increase our corn acreage, we are going to have an aggravated surplus problem on our hands, and we already have a problem of surplus corn. So what we need to do is to expand our dairy industry, and induce more families to engage in dairy farming and soil building, rather than to throw them further into the category of adding to the cotton surplus, as well as the corn surplus. In the event we destroy the butter market, we can rest assured that some of those now engaged in diversified types of agriculture in Alabama, Mississippi, and all the other Southern States, including Arkansas, will turn back to some kind of a row crop, whether it is peanuts, or cotton, or soybeans.

I merely call to the attention of my colleagues that we need to think seriously this afternoon and in the remaining hours or days before we cast our votes on the pending question and decide whether we are going to disrupt our whole agricultural economy, or whether we are going to reject the demand on the part of the oleo processor to be allowed to sell his product competitively with butter, in all its synthetic duplication of butter.

The total investment in cotton of the two crops as of the end of 1949 was $947,043,350.

If, by destroying the butter market, we stop the trend toward diversified farming and the introduction of the dairy cow into the Southern States we are going to have a greater clamor for cotton acreage quotas and a greater demand to grow cotton than there is at the present time, as I stated earlier in my remarks.

As an example of the reactions of dairy producers to the controversy in which we are engaged, I wish to read a letter from a Minnesota farmer, Mr. N. O. Evenson, of Litchfield, Minn.:

LITCHFIELD, MINN., January 3, 1950.
The Honorable EDWARD J. THYE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR THYE: I know that you are doing valiant work in behalf of the American farmer in your stand opposing the oleomargarine interests in pending legislation on this question. I am writing you, thinking you may be interested in receiving some opinions of farmers on this question.

I will make my comments brief; for this reason I will not mention some of the strongest arguments we have regarding the oleomargarine issue, such as the dairyman's rights to the yellow color.

This is a farmer writing to me:

I will confine my letter to some of my thoughts as to how this legislation can effect the consumers, who at present seem to be 100 percent on the oleo side of the question.

First, the coloring of oleo yellow will tend to raise the price of oleo and lower the price of butter. This will reduce the anticipated saving to the consumer.

Second, the dairy farmer is not compelled to keep on producing dairy products.

Give thought to that. He says the butter farmer is not compelled to keep on producing butter products. If he did not continue, I am afraid there would be times in the year when the consumer would be drastically short of fluid milk, because there are peak and low seasons of production.

To go back to the farmer's letter, he says further:

From our Minnesota Department of Agriculture we learn that there are 7,000 farms in Minnesota that had dairy cows on them in 1940 that do not have any dairy cows in 1949. This trend away from dairying is sure to increase if this bill is passed in its present form.

Third, the consumer should be interested in keeping the young men on the farm, where they are needed to produce food. Every obstacle placed on agriculture tends to increase the drift of farm boys to the cities, where they can have such privileges as the 40-hour week, time and one-half for overtime, etc. We see indications every day that can stop us and make us wonder as to what direction we are going. For an example, a good 120-acre farm with a full line of good buildings was sold recently in this neighborhood for $12,000. This would only buy a modest modern home in Litchfield or any other town in the land.

I am still farming the farm where I was born, and have a lot of first-hand experience with the problem of farming. In my opinion, the passage of the oleo bill will not only be a disastrous blow to agriculture but it will react indirectly and unfavorably to the best interest of the consumer.

Yours sincerely,

N. O. EVENSON.

Mr. Evenson was thinking soundly on this question.

Mr. President, dairy farmers do not object to fair and honest competition, but they vigorously resent unfair competition from an imitation product. Yellow oleomargarine lends itself readily to fraudulent substitution. Therefore, a law to bar interstate shipment of yellow oleo is eminently fair, since it leaves to the individual States the right to regulate its manufacture and sale within their own borders.

Oleomargarine should be sold as a separate and distinct product with an identity of its own. Had the oleomargarine industry the courage to market its product on its own merits, and not as an imitation of another product, little regulation would be necessary.

Leading dairy and farm organizations favor the repeal of all Federal taxes and license fees on oleomargarine. They urge, however, a ban on the interstate shipment of oleomargarine colored yellow in imitation of butter.

The Gillette-Wiley substitute, which is sponsored by 25 Senators, is designed to accomplish both of these purposes. I firmly believe that adoption of the substitute amendment would be in the public interest.

I most sincerely hope that the substitute amendment will receive the support of at least a majority of the Members of the Senate.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR TAFT ON FORMOSA

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, shortly before the first of the year, I expressed the opinion in an interview in Ohio that we should hang on to Formosa and prevent Communist occupation of Formosa, even though it involved the use of our Navy. I did not suggest the occupation of Formosa, nor the sending of any army, or even the sending of any navy. Our Navy is there already, with bases within a short distance, and its ships are between Formosa and China, as anyone knows who read this morning's newspapers. Formosa is a hundred miles from the mainland and there can be no crossing if our Navy makes it clear that ships carrying troops will not be allowed to cross. In fact, probably there would be no such attempt at all if the State Department made it perfectly clear that we do not intend to permit Communist occupation of Formosa.

The basis of our foreign policy in the last 3 or 4 years, if there has been any consistent foreign policy, is to contain communism where it is and prevent any single step of advance, because success in any such step is certain, considering the character of communism, to lead to another step. We, therefore, sent our military aid and our officers into Greece, although it might easily have involved us in war. We have given military aid to Turkey and to Iran. We have stood firm against Communist advance in Korea and provided the Koreans with large amounts of military aid and American advice. In undertaking the air lift in Germany, we certainly risked war with Russia in order to maintain unimpaired our position in Berlin. We are asked to appropriate billions of dollars to arm western Europe, although there is no evidence that at the present time the Russians contemplate any military attack in that area. We have given notice to Russia, by the adoption of the Atlantic Pact, that if its troops advance across the boundaries of Italy or the American or British zones of Austria or Germany or Denmark or Norway, it will find itself at war with us. In our policy of laying down the law, "this far you shall go and no further" we have not hesitated to risk war. There is not the slightest evidence that Russia will go to war with us because we interfere with a crossing to Formosa. It is hardly possible to see how the Chinese Communists by themselves can begin a war against the United States, or why they should do so.

In China for some reason, the State Department has pursued a different policy from that followed throughout the rest of the world. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind that the proper kind of sincere aid to the Nationalist Government a few years ago could have stopped communism in China. But the State Department has been guided by a left-wing group who obviously have wanted to get rid of Chiang, and were willing at least to turn China over to the Communists for that purpose. They have, in effect, defied the general policy in China laid down by Congress. In recent months it has, of course, been very doubtful whether aid to the Nationalist Government could be effective, and no one desires to waste American efforts. But Formosa is a place where a small amount of aid and at very small cost, can prevent the further spread of communism. Such action does not commit us to backing the Nationalist Government in any prolonged war against the Chinese Communists. We can determine later whether we ever wish to recognize the Chinese Communists and what the ultimate disposition of Formosa shall be.

As I understand, the people of Formosa if permitted to vote would probably vote to set up an independent republic of Formosa. The status of Formosa, therefore, should certainly be kept free for determination until the peace treaty has been written with Japan. Formosa must be legally a part of Japan, for it is difficult to see how the mere declaration of the President at Cairo or Potsdam can change that status without a treaty. One thing is certain, if the Communists take over Formosa, we will have just as much chance of setting up an independent republic of Formosa as we have of returning the western German provinces from Poland to Germany. We know that the Communists will give up nothing which they have occupied. Certainly, we do not desire or intend to undertake an aggressive war to recover land the Communists have occupied. On the other hand if, at the peace conference, it is decided that Formosa should be set up as an independent republic, we certainly have the means to force the Nationalist's surrender of Formosa.

The President's statement on January 5 follows the usual course of setting up a straw man and then proceeding to knock him over. He said:

The United States has no predatory designs on Formosa or on any other Chinese territory.

No one has suggested that it has.

The United States has no desire to obtain special rights or privileges or to establish military bases on Formosa at this time.

No one has suggested that it has such a desire.

The United States Government will not pursue a course which will lead to involvement in the civil conflict in China.

The course suggested will not lead to any such involvement, although, of course, we have involved ourselves in the civil conflict in Greece, in Korea, and elsewhere. When the President, however, says, "Similarly, the United States Government will not provide military aid or advice to Chinese forces on Formosa," he is departing from the policy pursued by us in every other part of the world where the question is whether communism shall be checked. While he states that we will continue the present ECA program of economic assistance, it is quite clear from the past course of the State Department that they have not the slightest intention of giving such assistance in any effective way in such a manner as to assist the occupants of Formosa and defeating a Communist attack.

Those who argue against any action in Formosa are curiously inconsistent. The distinguished Senator from Texas shudders at the possibility of war, although the chance we are taking is 1 in 10 compared to that we are taking in Europe today.

One columnist fears that any action in Formosa different from exactly the action of the State Department would antagonize the leaders of India and Indonesia. His theory seems to be that the way to stop communism in India is to permit it to move into Formosa. That is an exact reproduction of the argument used in support of the policy of Munich. Strange to say, the same columnist is all for extending aid to Burma and Indochina against Communist attack, although it is infinitely less practical and more expensive and difficult than the maintenance of an independent Formosa.

Another columnist argues that if we do not immediately extinguish the Nationalist Government, Red China will not be able to demobilize to carry out economic reconstruction. Therefore, he argues, we should recognize the Communist government. Whatever may be the arguments for such recognition, it is quite certain that it will in no way tend to reduce the armies of the Chinese Communists. Russia has continued to maintain a huge army, although it is faced with no threat of invasion whatever. I think it is safe to predict that it will be many years before the Chinese Communists reduce their armies by one soldier, because only by those armies can they possibly hope to control China.

The question of the containment of communism is largely a practical one. The only reason so much heat has been engendered about the Formosan situation is the bitter resentment of the State Department and its pro-Communist allies against any interference with its policy of liquidating the Nationalist Government.

No two men are more familiar with the Far East than General MacArthur and former President Hoover, and both of them are able to see the obvious military and political facts of the situation. Here is a small area of the world where, with no difficulty or expense, we could prevent the spread of communism to an island which might be of great strategic value and whose people desire to be independent.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I should like to know if the able Senator from Ohio is familiar with the press dispatch which came over the teletype a short time ago, and which I now wish to read into the RECORD as follows:

WASHINGTON.—Two Democratic Senate leaders today rejected a Republican demand that the Joint Chiefs of Staff be called to give Senators a report on the strategic value of Formosa to America's far-eastern defenses.

Chairman CONNALLY of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and Chairman TYDINGS of the Senate Armed Services Committee both turned thumbs down on the proposal made by Senator KNOWLAND.

KNOWLAND said he plans to place his request in writing before the armed services group. But TYDINGS said this was a matter for the Foreign Relations Committee to handle.

And CONNALLY told a reporter: "The President already has made his decision on Formosa. I have no intention at present of asking the Joint Chiefs for their views."

CONNALLY said the Joint Chiefs are due to visit the Far East next month. After their return, his committee may ask them to make a report—but not before.

KNOWLAND wants to know if the State Department and the President had the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and other military experts before arriving at the hands-off decision on Formosa.

The President announced last week the United States will not give military aid or advice to the defenders of the big island which is the Chinese National Government's last stronghold.

CONNALLY told a news conference yesterday the committee might call on the Joint Chiefs and Secretary Johnson for a report on the far eastern strategic situation.

But he made it clear this morning he plans no action at present in this direction.

"It would serve no good purpose to call them at this time," CONNALLY said. "I am satisfied the President made his decision with the full knowledge of all the facts involved."

I should like to ask the Senator whether he knows of any way the Congress of the United States can come to sound decisions in connection with the performance of its constitutional obligations in meeting the defense needs of the Nation and in helping to formulate foreign policy, if the Congress is to be denied information to which it is entitled and upon which it could base those judgments.

Mr. TAFT. No; I think Congress is entitled to such information, and must have it in order to reach sound judgments. Of course, the strategic importance of Formosa is something upon which I have not undertaken to pass in my statement. I do not know. But obviously its strategic importance is a vital factor in the determination of the Formosan policy; and obviously the Joint Chiefs of Staff should be listened to; and obviously we should have the best possible advice on the question of whether Formosa is a strategic place, from the point of view of war.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I merely wish to say, as one Senator who is not a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, that I hope the committee will press for an answer to these questions.

As a member of the Armed Services Committee, despite the quotation of the chairman of the committee to which I have referred—and I hope he is not correctly quoted in the article appearing today—I intend to bring that matter before the Armed Services Committee. I think it is one which vitally affects the defenses of the United States. But if we cannot succeed, through either of those committees, we shall make every effort to do so through the Appropriations Committee, when the National Defense Establishment comes before us for funds to support Okinawa and other bases in that area of the world, and when there is good reason to believe that the loss of Formosa into unfriendly hands may jeopardize our strategic position in our other island defenses. In one of those committees we certainly intend to get the answers to these questions.

We certainly did not get the answers to the questions in the Foreign Relations Committee yesterday.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, it seems to me that we certainly should have the best advice in regard to what the military facts are. I see no reason why we should not demand that they be given to us, entirely apart from what the foreign policy of the State Department may be.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STENNIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. As I have said before, Mr. President, I do not wish to enter this debate until all the facts are available. My interest has been in the development of the facts.

I know nothing about the authenticity of the statement read by the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND]; but, in view of its purport, I must say, with the greatest respect to my distinguished colleague, the chairman of the committee, that so far as I am concerned, I cannot feel that I have obtained adequate information in respect to the facts, without the testimony of the Defense Establishment in general, and of the Secretary and of the Chief of Staff in particular. So far as I am concerned, I would consider that testimony to be not only pertinent, but indispensable.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, to permit me to ask a question?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The Senator has expressed himself in regard to the defense of Formosa, and so forth. Perhaps the question I shall ask is a little beside the point; but inasmuch as the Senator is still on his feet and has spoken on this subject, I should like to ask him a question on a subject which was discussed the other day by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. Has the Senator from Ohio given any consideration, as a Senator and as a lawyer and as a citizen, to the title, let us say, to Formosa at the present time? Does the Senator consider Formosa to be a possession of the Nationalist Government, a part of China, or an island whose final disposition awaits further treaties and further discussions of Formosa?

Mr. TAFT. It seems obvious to me that legally Formosa was a part of Japan for 50 years, and was so recognized by the world. I do not know how that status could be changed, except by treaty. I do not think it could be changed by Presidential declaration at Cairo or Presidential declaration at Potsdam. Whatever its status, I think it is something different from the status of the mainland of China. I think that is entirely clear.

So I think we are entirely free, when we participate in the treaty with Japan, and I think the other nations participating in the treaty are entirely free, to set up an independent Formosa. I do not think our hands are necessarily tied by any other action taken by the United States.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Then, is it the Senator's opinion, from his knowledge of the law and of the general situation, that Formosa cannot be turned over to the Chinese Nationalists by any surrender agreement or papers signed there?

Mr. TAFT. No; I think they are merely in possession there today, by general consent. But I cannot see how China, whatever China is, has yet acquired any legal title to Formosa.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. The first answer which has been given would, it seems to me, indicate the correct view, for otherwise would it not be possible, and even probable in this case, that we would find ourselves, so far as Germany and Japan were concerned, in the position that secret agreements had been made at some of the conferences, and therefore the entire peace had already been determined, and there would not be anything for the peace treaty to take up?

Mr. TAFT. I do not think we can admit—whatever the moral obligations may be—that we are in any way legally bound by declarations of the President, either in secret or made openly, as to the disposition of different parts of the world.

Mr. FERGUSON. Is it not one of the purposes of the provision of the Constitution which calls for ratification by the Senate of peace treaties and all other treaties, that there must be formal action by both the President and the Senate in passing upon questions which might involve us in war?

Mr. TAFT. Yes; I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I came into the Chamber just at the end of the Senator's remarks. Of course, I was very much interested in them, in light of the position I took here a few days ago.

I shall say to the Senator, if he will permit me to do so, that the proposition I discussed 2 days ago was based upon the assumption—and apparently the Senator from Ohio makes the same assumption—that until the peace treaty is signed, there is a question about the status of this particular part of the world.

Mr. TAFT. That is as far as we have to go.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Yes; that is as far as we have to go.

Mr. TAFT. Because if there is a question, we at least should keep the field open, so that we can decide that question as it should be decided. But once the Communists are there, we shall no longer be a free agent in respect to deciding that question, unless we are willing to undertake an aggressive war.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Then the Senator from Ohio will agree with me, will he not, that there is a responsibility on the part of the United States, if there is a question as to whether Formosa is or is not a part of Japan, to see that the status quo is preserved, for the protection of everyone concerned—the people of the island, the Chinese Nationalist Government, the Communists—if they have any rights there—and ourselves and our own interest?

Mr. TAFT. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I thank the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. The Senator has suggested a very interesting question which, I take it, referred to the powers of the President of the United States in time of war to make agreements of a military character. I take it that question is to some extent implicit in this problem.

I do not know to what extent hitherto that has been a matter of concern; but is it not obvious that if the principle of the power of the President to make, in time of war, agreements of primarily a military character, in return, let us say, for the entrance into the war, at a certain time, of a particular country, in return for which the President has promised certain territories, can be established, then, despite the provision of the Constitution, as it is stated very plainly in section 2 of article 2, namely—

He—

That is to say, the President—shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—

And I labor the word "advice" somewhat—to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur—

The President's power will be unlimited, will it not?

If there is no limit on the Presidential power to make agreements in time of war, then the entire function of the Senate in that respect might easily be eliminated. Is that correct?

Mr. TAFT. Yes; I think so. The President has rather encroached already on the powers of the Senate; and now a good many things which used to be done by treaty are done by agreement.

But certainly the disposition of the territory of another nation is something which still must be done by treaty, and cannot be done by executive agreement. If we admit any such power to proceed by way of executive agreement, we certainly very much curtail the powers given to the Senate by the Constitution.

Mr. BREWSTER. And is it not highly important that the Senate, if it has any regard for the importance of its constitutional functions, should see to it that there is some determination of this right, before we completely surrender it, particularly since we now have involvements in so many sections of the world? Moreover, are we not now still at war?

Mr. TAFT. I do not know that we are at war. We have not yet disposed of the questions arising from the war. I suppose that technically we are still in a state of war, for the purpose of many statutes and for various other purposes. For some purposes, I would think we are not at war.

Mr. BREWSTER. If in a time of actual hostilities the Presidential power were established to make agreements which would bind us, might not it be possible that then we could easily move into a twilight zone—whether we call it war, or regardless of what we call it—in which the President could continue to assert the right to make agreements which would bind the country under certain eventualities, if we continued to permit this encroachment upon the power of the Senate and this expansion of Presidential power?

Mr. TAFT. Yes; I think that is true.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. So as to carry out what the Senator has just said to the Senator from Maine, and to bring the matter to a logical conclusion, let me ask this question: In a case in which our country has been at war with another country, and the other country has surrendered, its title to its possessions cannot be turned over to another country without the consent of the Senate, can it? Is not that a logical conclusion?

Mr. TAFT. Yes; I think that is a logical conclusion.

FEDERAL RENT CONTROL—TELEGRAM TO GOVERNOR DEWEY BY SENATOR CAIN

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Washington felt constrained yesterday afternoon to send a telegram to the Governor of New York State. I wish to read the telegram, which speaks rather plainly for itself, and to draw its substance to the thoughtful consideration of my colleagues. It reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 10, 1950.

GOV. THOMAS E. DEWEY,
Albany, N. Y.

DEAR GOVERNOR: The New York Times of Monday, January 9, carried a front-page story by its Albany correspondent, Leo Egan, in which it was stated that you and your advisers are considering the advisability of replacing the prevailing Federal rent law in the near future with a State rent-control system. It would not be proper for me to say that rent controls have outlived their usefulness in New York State because I am not familiar with the facts in your area of jurisdiction but I am qualified to venture a prediction that President Truman's request for an extension of the 1949 Rent Act beyond its termination date of June 30, 1950, will be denied by a majority of the Republicans and Democrats in the Congress. Those of us in the Congress who have considered the rent-control question since 1946 to be an economic rather than a political problem are now completely certain that we can defeat the proposed extension of the Federal law by using only the economic facts which have resulted in those scores of American communities of all sizes which have been decontrolled in the last year. Those for whom I speak will use every conceivable legitimate means including whatever time is required to prevent the Federal Government from any longer mismanaging and interfering with the property rights of American citizens throughout the Nation. It is unrealistic to assume that the Congress will authorize Federal rent controls for the beginning of our new half century. If there are isolated communities in America which can establish a proven need for continuing rent controls those communities or their parent States must be charged with a full responsibility for managing their own affairs. New York City may be an exception to the general rule that only good will result from the decontrol of rents. In practically every instance where a city of any size has been decontrolled the following benefits to the community have been in evidence: Restoration of the historic American right of free collective bargaining between tenant and owner, large numbers of locked-up rental units have been returned to the rental market, large numbers of homes previously held for sale only have become available to tenants, rental units have been released by tenants who have purchased homes, residential construction has been accelerated as have the sales of homes, and existing rental accommodations have become rapidly more attractive because the owners have remodeled, repaired, and redecorated their facilities. These are benefits which every State and community must desire. These are but some of the benefits which have come to decontrolled American communities and the case histories of the communities in question will be used by reasonable Members of both parties in the Congress to make certain that there will be no extension of the Federal rent law beyond June. In wiring you of my conviction that an end to Federal rent controls is certain I hope that I am rendering a constructive service to you and to every other State in the Nation. Those in the Congress who feel as I do want no State or community to say in coming months that they hadn't been informed that Federal rent controls would expire on the last day of June. When President Truman requested an extension of Federal rent controls as being necessary for another year he indicated to me at least that he knew distressingly little about the history of the problem, and continues to ignore and disregard the economic facts involved. I take it to be a foregone conclusion that Mr. Truman's own party in the Congress won't support the President's demand. The time is long overdue when New York State and every other State in the Union ought to be completely accountable to their citizens for the fundamental and important issues involved in the management of their private-property-rights question. I am certain that every State will attempt to rid itself of all rent controls everywhere at the earliest possible moment. If the Federal Government is permitted to extend rent controls into our new decade those restrictions against property rights will probably remain forever. Congress is possessed of too much common sense and sense of simple justice to permit this to happen. I would urge you and your legislature to do what it thinks is right for New York State without any further dead-hand control by the Federal Government. With cordial best wishes for your happiness and success in the new year.

HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senator.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I wish to address myself very briefly to the consideration of the bill H. R. 2023, to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

At the Democratic Convention, which I was not privileged to attend, but to whose proceedings I listened over the radio, I remember very distinctly that about 2 o'clock in the morning President Truman, in the course of his address to the convention, stated that the farmers of the United States would be guilty of ingratitude if they did not vote for the Democratic ticket nominated at the convention. He went on to say that labor likewise would be guilty of ingratitude if it did not support the Democratic ticket. Apparently the farmers of the country took the President at his word.

I have before me the official returns of the election, showing that the dairy State of Colorado cast its six electoral votes for Mr. Truman for President of the United States, because the Democrats received a majority of the votes of the State of Colorado. As one reads through the list he finds Idaho, with 4 votes in the Truman column, Iowa with 10, Minnesota with 11, Montana with 4, Ohio with 26, Utah with 4, Washington with 8, Wisconsin with 12, and Wyoming with 3. It is simply a matter of arithmetic to conclude that if we total those electoral votes, deduct them from the 383 votes the President received, and add them to the 189 Governor Dewey received, the Republicans would have won by an electoral vote of 272 to 220.

Mr. President, before I go into the merits of the oleomargarine bill itself, I wish very briefly to address myself to the broken promise made by the Democratic Party, year after year, that they were going to enforce the Sherman Antitrust Act. During the course of the debate yesterday, the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], as shown on page 261 of the RECORD, said:

Mr. President, I should like to quote it for the Senator's information at this time. It is not very long. I read from page 64 of the report of the Federal Trade Commission on the concentration of productive facilities, 1947. This is the statement of the Federal Trade Commission.

I am simply quoting what was said yesterday by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas. He proceeded to quote from the report of the Federal Trade Commission, as follows:

"The pattern of control in the processing and marketing of dairy products is rather similar to that of the meat-packing industry. Before World War I the dairy-products industry was made up of small local units, either independently owned or under cooperative control. The contrast between the past and the present state of concentration is perhaps more striking in this field than in any other manufacturing industry.

"As the concentration curve for the industry shows, the two leading dairy corporations, National Dairy Products Corp. and the Borden Co., clearly dominate the industry, holding 27.5 and 21.4 percent, respectively, of the industry's net capital assets."

There is nothing comparable to this in the field of margarine manufacture. That is my statement. I continue to read from the report of the Federal Trade Commission:

"Thereafter the slope of the curve becomes much more gradual, with the third firm, the Carnation Co., holding 6.9 percent and five other corporations, with assets ranging from 2 to 4 percent of the industry's total, owning an additional 15.5 percent. Thus the eight largest firms control 71.3 percent of the total net capital assets of all corporations operating primarily in this field.

"Even these figures, however, substantially understate the degree of concentration affecting the ultimate consumer. This understatement stems from two factors: (a) Within the broad industry groups, concentration is frequently higher for important individual products; and (b) many of these individual products are highly perishable and can only be shipped within a limited market area, a circumstance which frequently results in a higher degree of concentration in local markets than is true of the country as a whole."

So, Mr. President, what do we have? What have the American people got after all these years of Democratic rule in this country? The great Democratic Party, which says it is for the little fellow, which accuses the Republicans of representing large corporations, has done nothing to prevent monopolies. We find the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] quoting the Federal Trade Commission and showing the few companies which he enumerated having control of 71.3 percent of the dairy industry.

I stood upon this floor only a few months ago protesting the nomination of the leader of certain trusts to be Ambassador to Argentina. The President chose a man for that position who had raised the price of ice cream and milk to little children. The great Democratic Party brags about representing the little fellow, the poor man, but it picked the greatest monopolist of them all, a man who had organized the dairy industry which, in 1 day, in three States, grabbed all the manufacturing plants and formed them into a monopoly, and he has been nominated as Ambassador to Argentina.

I ask this question, Mr. President: Whom have the Democrats named to be general manager of all their Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners? Out of the 150,000,000 people in the United States, Mr. President, whom has the Democratic Party chosen? I shall give his name in a few moments, but before doing so I wish to make it very plain that in behalf of the American people we are dealing today with perhaps the largest trust, the largest monopoly, in the world.

I hold in my hand a copy of Fortune magazine for December 1947. I want to read the first four lines of an article entitled "The World of Unilever":

> Seen from the Old World, the United States is a commercial paradise, where almost every prospect pleases and only Tom Clark annoys. It is the one place in the world where only crackpots want to nationalize industry.

I call the attention of every Senator upon the floor to the first three lines which I have read:

> Seen from the Old World, the United States is a commercial paradise, where almost every prospect pleases and only Tom Clark annoys.

At that time Tom Clark was Attorney General of the United States, Mr. President. He had brought various antitrust suits under the Sherman law. The Sherman Antitrust Act was passed in 1891. The years 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895, went by, and not a single monopolist was put in jail. 1910, 1920, and 1940 passed, yet, under an antitrust statute over 50 years old, not one monopolist was put in jail. I could forget it if the Republicans did not put anyone in jail, because the opposition has always said the Republican Party was the party of the trusts. If we go out among the people it will be found that the Democrats have given the Republicans that reputation.

But in 1932 the Democrats took over. They said they were going to protect the little fellow, the poor man. I heard, over the radio, their candidate for President say that time and time again.

Did the Democratic Party put in jail any of the monopolists who were robbing the American people? Not one. Were any monopolists put in jail in 1934? Not one. Were any of them put in jail in 1935? Not one.

In 1936 we again heard the Democrats say upon the hustings, "We are the party of the little fellow. We are here to protect the consumer."

According to the speech of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] yesterday, certain corporations have made one combination after another, but, as yet, none of the monopolists have been jailed.

What has the Democratic Party been doing, Mr. President? The people took them at their word in 1936, and monopolies grew and grew and no monopolist was jailed in 1936, in 1937, in 1938, or in 1939.

In 1940 there was a request for more appropriations. Representatives of the Department of Justice said they did not have enough money. So the Senate gave them practically all the money they asked for in order to carry out the antitrust statutes. What happened?

There was another election in 1940, and again and again we heard the candidate for the Presidency tell the people that the Democratic Party was the only salvation of the poor man; that it was against the wicked, terrible trusts which were supporting the Republican Party, and that if the Democratic Party was voted in, what would it not do to those trusts. But 1941 went by, and no monopolist was put in jail. The years 1942 and 1943 went by, and still the antitrust laws were not enforced.

I now come to 1944, when again the Democrats repeated upon platforms all over the Nation that they were going to put monopolists in jail if the people would only once more entrust them with that power.

There is not a Senator on this floor who can name one man who was put in jail for a violation of the antitrust law up to 1946. Not one man was put in jail. The only one who was put in jail was Eugene Debs. He was put in jail, not in the enforcement of the Antitrust Act, but because of the violation of an injunction.

Now we come to the oleomargarine matter. As was stated by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] yesterday, one of the greatest monopolies of all time is the one which is going to benefit in case the pending bill becomes law.

A year ago, Mr. President, when it looked as though we might repeal the tax on oleomargarine, this great monopoly, together with the Best Foods Co., who had sold one of its subsidiaries to it, and who controlled the price of oleomargarine in 3 weeks, raised the price by 23 cents a pound. If that is not true, let someone refute it. Where was this great Democratic administration then? Was anyone arrested?

One of the principal arguments at that time was that butter was too high in price. The argument was that it was so high that a poor man could not buy it. The price of butter was 70 cents, 75 cents, 80 cents, and 85 cents, up to a dollar a pound. The price of butter went up and up. They said, "We want oleomargarine." Yet, I repeat, when it looked as though the measure was going to pass and the tax would be taken off oleomargarine, three companies got control of oleomargarine all over the world. They did it almost in the twinkling of an eye, and the price of oleomargarine jumped 23 cents a pound.

Is that the way the Democratic Party protects the poor people? Is that the way the Democratic Party protects the consumer?

Only a short time ago President Truman said that the farmers would be guilty of ingratitude if they did not vote the Democratic ticket, yet today we find the Democratic Party double-crossing the dairy farmers in the States which I have named, and which voted for them. The Democratic Party is double-crossing them—for whom? Why, Mr. President, for the greatest monopoly that ever existed in the world.

Referring again to the Fortune magazine article for December 1947, let me give Senators some idea as to how large this organization, this monopoly, is. I do not desire merely to gloss over, or not to go into detail. The Senator from Minnesota described it pretty well yesterday in his speech on the Senate floor, but I desire to go into a little greater detail, to point out exactly who will be benefited if the pending measure shall be enacted. This measure is going to hurt agriculture and the farmer. Whom is it going to help? As I have said, the Senator from Minnesota covered that pretty well yesterday when he mentioned this monopoly. Now let us go into some of the details of it.

Referring now to page 88 of Fortune magazine for December 1947, it says:

> This industrial omnium-gatherum—

Referring to Unilever, this corporation, this monopoly—> is built on as homely and vital a raw material as it is possible to find—on what is known redundantly as fats and oils (an oil is a liquid fat). The fats are extracted from vegetables like peanuts and coconuts, and from animals like cows, pigs, and whales. People encounter them most commonly in butter, margarine, lard, and soap, and without them, as without grain, people obviously would have a tough time getting along. Unilever is the biggest single factor in the world supply of fats and oils, purchasing and processing more than 2,000,000 of the 5,800,000 tons of fats and oils normally finding their way into world commerce.

There we get an idea as to how big this corporation is, Mr. President. It controls 2,000,000 of the 5,800,000 tons of fats and oils in all the world. I continue reading from the article:

> It makes no butter—

> and renders little lard, but it manufactures more soap and margarine than any other company—about two-thirds of the soap used in the British Empire, and about 12 percent of world consumption; about 75 percent of the margarine eaten in Europe and about 40 percent of world consumption (outside Russia). Even in 1946, with supplies far short of prewar and rationed almost everywhere, Unilever turned out 750,000 tons of soap and 560,000 tons of margarine, for which it received the equivalent of $445,000,000. In crushing palm kernels, copra, peanuts, and other oil-bearing raw materials, it was left with 1,256,000 tons of residues, which it sold as cattle feed for the equivalent of about $67,000,000. It also processed and sold nearly 600,000 tons of oils to other manufacturers and the Government for $144,000,000. Despite its dominant position in the Empire and on the Continent, Unilever feels compelled to promote and advertise its products as no others in the industrial canon are promoted. It was before the war, one of the world's biggest advertisers, spending almost $50,000,000 to sell products like Stork and Blue Band margarine, and Lux, Lifebuoy, Rinso, Persil, and Sunlight soap.

But the basic fat and oil products account for only 60 percent of the company's turn-over. Unilever also does at least a $25,000,000 business in canned goods, of which some $12,000,000 is in canned peas. Before the war it sold more than $7,500,000 worth of Wall's ice cream (in Britain), most of it through white-clad vendors on tricycles bearing the legend "Stop me and buy one." It owns MacFisheries, Ltd., of Britain, the world's largest chain of fish stores (356), which last year sold about $35,000,000 worth of fish and game. Besides dozens of other products, it sells more than $35,000,000 worth of toothpaste (Pepsodent and Solidox) and perfumes and cosmetics. It owned paper and textile mills in Germany, and is half owner of Thames Board Mills, the U. K.'s largest paperboard maker.

Now I shall take this company to Africa, Mr. President, to Africa, where 20 cents a day is paid for labor. We find Senators on this floor saying they are for the pending bill, but we do not find the CIO or the A. F. of L. here fighting for the farmers. They are not lifting a hand. So far as American farmers are concerned, they are abandoned by labor.

Some of us who come from the dairy States find that we have been unable to get any support of any kind from labor in this fight. Perhaps some of the labor leaders are here, within the sound of my voice. The time will come when labor will need the farmer again, and while I will not say it will be refreshing, at least one will have the satisfaction of saying, "When our backs were to the wall, where was labor?"

So I want to take this company over to Africa, where 20 cents a day is paid to a laboring man to compete with the farmers of the United States engaged in the dairy business.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I know the Senator from North Dakota, with his demonstrated friendship for the workingmen of this country, would like to know that at least one section of the American Federation of Labor has been in support of the Wiley-Gillette substitute. Men and women working in the creameries, those who drive the milk wagons, trucks, and so on, have, through their labor organizations, supported the substitute. The branch of the American Federation of Labor known as the teamsters' union, and other American Federation of Labor unions have supported us in this fight against the monopoly the Senator is so well describing, and against this kind of what we might very well call attack upon small business enterprises. I simply bring that to the Senator's attention so that the record may be clear.

Mr. LANGER. I thank the distinguished Senator from Minnesota. I am delighted that Dan Tobin of the teamsters' union, and his union, and other A. F. of L. unions are with us in this fight. I am delighted to have the RECORD show that fact.

Let us now go over to Africa, where this monopoly also operates. I quote from Fortune magazine of December 1947:

Unilever's most extraordinary excursion into other fields arises from its quest for raw materials. The United Africa Co., a huge wholly owned subsidiary that accounts for just about a quarter of its consolidated sales, not only grows oil palms and buys raw materials of all kinds from the natives of West Africa and the Congo, it sells everything salable to them. It is, as a matter of fact, the world's largest trading company. An article in a later issue will be devoted to its chromatic activities; suffice to say here that through U. A. C. the Unilever organization finds itself right in the middle of one of the world's most explosive race situations—besides running one of the largest General Motors overseas distributorships, a shirt factory, a full-sized steamship company, and one of the biggest stores in Istanbul.

Mr. President, I have a definition of this company given by the London Economist. This is what the London Economist says about the monopoly which is trying to force the farmers of the United States out of the dairy business:

The Unilever combine and communism—

These are not my words, Mr. President. These are the words of the London Economist, one of the most conservative newspapers in England.

The Unilever combine and communism have not a few points of similarity—in a strictly business sense. That combine is governed by committees innumerable. It controls the working life of the vegetable-oil industries almost as completely as the Soviet monopolizes the working life of the Russian people. It embraces every activity from the production of the raw materials to the retail selling of finished product. And, curiously enough, both Soviet and Unilever catch whales in the Antarctic. For the investor and economist, however, the significant feature is that the more enlightened and efficient Unilever and the Soviet become the more difficult it is to investigate their operations and to analyze their accounts.

Mr. President, is it not strange that even a United States Senator cannot find out what companies are included in this merger? I tried and tried; I went to every source possible in Washington, and I was unable to find anywhere, in any book, a list of the various companies that are amalgamated and affiliated, which are subsidiaries of this giant monopoly. I received some 45 names.

A few months ago I placed in the RECORD the report of the death of the president of this company, who died in Minneapolis, Minn., while there on a visit. In the Minneapolis newspapers appeared an obituary. The obituary contained the statement that he was the president of 613 companies, different corporations, and that they were doing business in 40 different countries.

Mr. President, who have the Democrats chosen to be chairman of the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners? I will tell the Senate in a moment. The Democratic Party, which says it is for the little people, has chosen to handle the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners a man whose name I shall give in a moment. I shall show how the Democratic Party picked him out of 150,000,000 people. The party which says it is against trusts and against monopolies has chosen for this purpose a man who heads a great monopoly.

I read again the quotation from the London Economist:

The Unilever combine and communism have not a few points of similarity—in a strictly business sense. The combine is governed by committees innumerable. It controls the working life of the vegetable-oil industries almost as completely as the Soviet monopolizes the working life of the Russian people. It embraces every activity from the production of the raw materials to the retail selling of finished goods. And, curiously enough, both Soviet and Unilever catch whales in the Antarctic. For the investor and economist, however, the significant feature is that the more enlightened and efficient Unilever and the Soviet become, the more difficult it is to investigate their operations and to analyze their accounts.

Mr. Plummer, in his book, International Combines in Modern Industry, has this to say:

The truth of the last sentence becomes patent when we try to trace the combine's ramifications through to the subsidiaries. In England, for instance, Unilever, Ltd., controls English Margarine Works, Ltd., and the British section of the Van den Bergh undertaking, through which it controls Meadow Dairy Co., Ltd., which in turn controls Pearks Dairies, Sherry's Dairies, Brough's Tea, Ltd., and Neale's Tea Stores. Unilever, Ltd., also holds a substantial interest in Home and Colonial Stores, Ltd., through which it is linked with Allied Stores, Ltd., Liptons, Ltd., and Maypole Dairy Co., Ltd., and, through the latter, with Maypole Margarine Works, Palmine, Ltd., and British Oil Works. This is but a sketch of the combine's English interests, and it is no more than a corner of the whole vast area of its ramifications, for it controls the major part of the margarine industry of Europe, and had interests in oil-crushing and refining factories and allied industries, with their distributing organizations, in Britain, Holland, France, Belgium, Germany, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Italy, and the Dutch Indies.

Here we have a man heading a great monopoly chosen by the Democrats, who love the common people, to manage the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners this year. I will give his name in a moment. I continue to read from Mr. Plummer's book:

The combine's West African interests are in the care of the United Africa Co., Ltd., in which the combine holds 80 percent of the share capital and a dominant proportion of the voting power. Moreover, the United Africa Co. holds, directly or indirectly, controlling interests in no fewer than 66 companies carrying on operations in different parts of the world.

Altogether there are now 616 companies controlled by this combine. At the time its president died the combine controlled 613 companies, and 3 more have been added since. Since I made my last speech on the subject 3 more companies have been included making the total 616.

Alfred Plummer in his book entitled "International Combines in Modern History," published by the Pitman Publishing Co., New York City, 1938, had this further to say:

As an example of a great international trust recently in the public eye we may cite Unilever Ltd., which was registered in November 1927 as Margarine Union, Ltd., and having acquired all the ordinary share capital (£6,500,000) of Lever Bros., Ltd., it changed its name to Unilever, Ltd., in September 1929. This combine includes Van den Berghs, Ltd., the well-known dealers in margarine and similar products, incorporated in 1895, with a capital of over £3,000,000. For many years there was stiff competition between Van den Berghs, Ltd., and Anton Jurgens & Co., a Dutch firm, and in 1908 the competitors thought that it would be to their mutual advantage to enter into an agreement for sharing profits. Accordingly, over a period of years three pooling agreements were entered into. The first agreement, dated February 13, 1908, contained many complicated provisions, but broadly its effect was that each company acquired an interest in the profits of the other. There was a supplemental agreement in 1913 whereby it was agreed that subject to certain modifications the principal agreement of 1908 should continue in force until the end of 1940. After the settlement of a complicated dispute arising out of these agreements, the members of the Van den Bergh and Jurgens families decided to consolidate their interests by forming a Dutch holding company and an English holding company.

Mr. President, it was only a few years ago when, under a Democratic President, the SEC bill was passed, and holding companies apparently were outlawed forever. Yet today whom do we find the Democratic Party taking to its bosom? Who is going to be the general manager, all over the Nation, of the Jackson-Jefferson Day dinners? Wait a little, Mr. President, and I will tell you. Who of the 157,000,000 people in the United States has the Democratic Party picked?

The report further states that—

In association with the Dutch—

They have now formed a Dutch holding company and an English holding company. They were not satisfied with one holding company; they organized two.

In association with the Dutch sister concern, Unilever N. V., Unilever Ltd., now controls not only the Jurgens and Van den Bergh groups of companies, but also the Schlicht and Hartog concerns, both of which manufacture soap and margarine, the former mainly in central and eastern Europe, and the latter in Holland. In 1931, two additional companies were formed under the names of Unilever (Raw Materials), Ltd., and Unilever Grondstoffen Maatschapij N. V., in order to facilitate the buying, holding, and administration of stocks for the English and Dutch groups of companies, respectively. This colossal international combine now includes over 600 companies—supreme twin holding companies (Unilever Ltd. and Unilever N. V.) are kept separate not only for organizational reasons but also in order to avoid the costs and complications of double taxation. But the real nerve centers are to be found in the interlocking directorates of two private companies, each of which controls 50 percent of the voting power in Unilever Ltd. and Unilever N. V.; so that the British and Dutch interests jointly control both. The whole vast organization is divided into a number of groups of companies. There are separate directors and managers for each group, and a small number of directors whose special function is to keep constantly in touch with the group executives so as to maintain uniformity of policy.

Namely, 616 companies, in 40 different countries.

I read further:

So the entire 616 companies will have the same kind of policy, which, of course, is robbing the common people along the same lines all the time.

Referring again to the article which appeared in Fortune magazine, I wish to say that on page 90 appears the picture of the man selected by the Democratic Party to be the general manager for its Jackson-Jefferson Day dinners. But I do not wish to give his name yet. In a moment I will tell the distinguished gentlemen on the other side of the aisle who he is. But I assure you, Mr. President, that every farmer who tried to make a living when this man was appointed to a responsible position a few years ago by the President, knows, to his sorrow, who he is.

I shall read further from the Fortune article. When this monopoly got to work and started out, it did a great deal of advertising, promoting, and competing. The article states:

Advertising, promoting, and competing, Lever expanded rapidly, and he made soap a mass-produced item by the simple device of selling it as a specialty. In 1888 he started a huge soap factory and model worker's village in a dreary marsh across the Mersey River from Liverpool, and called it Port Sunlight. It is still the world's largest soap factory, and is served by the world's largest privately owned dock. He flooded England with Sunlight, sent it overseas, and was soon manufacturing it all over the world, in Switzerland, Australia, Canada, Belgium, France, the Netherlands, the United States, and Germany. To secure his raw-material supply he picked up 200,000 acres of land in the British Solomons, on which he proposed to plant coconut trees, and got a 1,875,000-acre concession in the Congo for growing oil palm trees, where he built houses, schools, and hospitals for the natives.

But like most born competitors of his time, Lever turned out to be a born monopolist. The older he grew, the less he slept, the more he saw, the more he wanted, and the more he bought. In 1906 he promoted an amalgamation of the leading soap makers, but it was attacked furiously by some of the press, which printed evidence of fraudulent trading and other malpractices.

Mr. President, the article is too long to read in full or even to have printed in full in the RECORD; but I have picked out the most pertinent parts of it. The following appears on page 204:

Besides getting into the British margarine business (margarine had been imported mostly from the Netherlands, so during World War I the Government asked him to make it) he founded the MacFisheries firm, bought a whaling company and built it up, and acquired a half dozen leading British soap, soap flake, chemical, oil cake, and candle companies. Among them was the eminent Joseph Crosfield & Sons, Ltd., makers of soaps and chemicals, which had been the first (in 1906) to hydrogenate hitherto distasteful fats like whale oil and render them first rate for any use. By 1920—he had gathered unto him more than 75 percent of the British soap business.

Thirty years ago—

So, Mr. President, away back in 1920 he was doing three-quarters of all the soap business in England.

Now I read from page 207:

The story of margarine, man's most successful attempt to compete with the cow, is mostly the story of Margarine Unie's predecessors.

Mr. President, perhaps most of us realize that if we go out on the street and talk to the people we meet there, we find that today the average man does not know where oleomargarine comes from or what it is made of. Of course, those who want to cram it down the throats of the American people leave off the word "oleo," and just call it margarine, because margarine sounds better; it sounds something like "Marjorie" a girl's name. So the producers of oleomargarine like to call it margarine, and leave off the word "oleo."

But I wish to state exactly how it came about that we ever had such a thing as margarine or oleomargarine in the first place. I read further from the article appearing in Fortune magazine.

The story goes back to the middle 1800's and the little town of Osch (later Oss) in the kingdom of the Netherlands, where there flourished two friendly rivals, butter exporters. They made their living buying surplus butter all over the Continent, refreshing it by a simple churning process, and exporting the revived product. One of the firms belonged to Anton Jurgens and his sons, Jan, Arnold, and Henry, devout Catholics; the other to Simon Van den Bergh, a pious, kind, philoprogenitive Jew who, when he got rich, spent great sums in helping refugees from the Russian pogroms flee to America.

Then, in 1870, came the Franco-Prussian War, which caught France short, among other things, of butter. But Napoleon III had anticipated the shortage, and before the war had commissioned a chemist named Mège-Mouriez to experiment on a substitute. Mège-Mouriez wisely studied the cow. He noticed that unfed cows continued for days to deliver milk rich in butterfat but lost their animal fat in the process. He naturally concluded that the butterfat in the milk had been derived from the cow's fat, and verified his conclusion by pressing caul fat (from around the heart) with milk, and so making an artificial butter. For good measure, he invented the name "margarine" to describe this butter.

Jan Jurgens heard about the process while in France and immediately got the rights to manufacture margarine. At this point the narrative can be taken up by an extract from the Van den Berghs touching little family history.

Mr. President, I need not go into all the family history, but the article states what bitter rivals those two men became, after they had been friends almost from childhood.

Later on in the article we find this quotation from a newspaper headline: "Margarine king dead."

The Dutchman had died in 1907. In other words, the heads of those two families had been fighting each other, but in 1907 one of them died.

After that, Simon's sons commanded the fight against the Jurgens. But the Jurgens were led by Henry's son, Anton, the strongest and ablest of the bunch—a sharp-faced, shrewd little man with an overpowering ambition to run the whole margarine industry. Remembering that William Lever had come to the Netherlands and had tried to sell Uncle Jan on the brand idea (Jan had called Lever a fanatic), Anton had taken a leaf from Lever and pioneered branded margarine. He also had been bitten by the monopoly bug—

As was so well described yesterday by the distinguished junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Then we find this:

At first he didn't get very far, but about the time of the depression of 1907 competition got so ferocious and duplication of facilities so flagrant that a profit-pooling arrangement was concluded.

So instead of dividing the stock and the control, they made an agreement to divide the profits 50–50.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in my remarks page 213, beginning with the words "mostly because of this decline," and continuing to the end of the paragraph on page 214.

There being no objection, the extract was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mostly because of this decline, the directors decided to redistribute the assets of the two holding companies so that the British and the Dutch sides of the business would be more nearly equal in volume and profits. This seemingly odd decision goes back to the days of Margarine Union and Margarine Unie, which were tied together by a unique equalization agreement designed to get the benefits of consolidation without incurring the penalties of double taxation. Under the agreement the companies had identical boards and their stockholders had equal rights, and each was bound to help pay the preference dividends of the other, if need arose, and to pay the same dividend on its common. When the Unilever companies replaced the Margarine companies, the agreement remained in force. In 1937, what with falling Dutch profits and no prospect of getting anything out of Germany, it looked as if the English company's dividends would be held down by the imbalance in earning power. So the assets were distributed by giving nearly everything outside the British Empire, including the prosperous American company, to the N. V. side of the business and leaving the rest with the British side. At the same time, Lever Bros. was completely merged with Unilever Ltd., and the names of the two great holding companies were changed to Lever Bros. & Unilever, Ltd., and Lever Bros. & Unilever N. V. If it had not been for the double taxation, to repeat, the two originally would have been consolidated into one, and the question of redistributing the assets would of course never have arisen.

How American profits helped shore up the N. V. side of the combination—remember, Germany's profits were blocked—may be deduced from the following estimate of Unilever's 1937 sales and profits by countries.

Lever Bros. & Unilever Ltd.

The war changed these proportions radically, and put N. V. in an even worse position. The Continent faded out of the picture, and Germany, Austria, and the countries east of the Stettin-Trieste line are still excluded from the accounts. The United States now earns practically all N. V.'s profits. Yet total turn-over for 1946, excluding intracompany transactions, was around £270,000,000, or £80,000,000 more than the combined gross shown above, and total profits were £12,000,000, or hardly below the 1937 figure. What happened, as the Continent passed out, was that business in Britain, the United States, and in the domain of United Africa Co. expanded by more than enough to compensate for European declines. United Africa proved to be the star performer, almost doubling its 1937 turn-over and profits. Despite rationing and short supplies, the British and American companies more than held their own, partly because of an acquisition program designed to compensate for the loss of Germany. The United States company bought Pepsodent; and N. V.'s Lipton Tea Co., tea blenders in the United States, went in heavily for dehydrated soups. The British company got the right to manufacture and distribute Birds Eye frosted foods outside the United States, and purchased Batchelor's of Sheffield, world's biggest pea processors and canners. And last year Smethurst Ltd., fish curers of Grimsby, came into the fold.

Mr. LANGER. When Fortune magazine started to write up the monopoly, its editors apparently thought they could do it all in one article. Before they finished, they found it required three editions of Fortune. They treated it serially, as a continuing story. We turn now to Fortune for January 1948. A little while ago I made the statement that all the laborers in Africa were paid was 20 cents a day. I call attention to page 62, where, as a part of the article, there are pictures showing the laborers doing various kinds of work, under which is this note:

West African labor is poorly paid because as a whole it is very unproductive. The 80 men hauling the logs, for example, get so little—20 cents a day—that they are almost as cheap as a tractor, which is still unavailable.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this entire article, dealing with the monopoly, be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNILEVER'S AFRICA—LEVER BROS.' UNITED AFRICA CO. IS THE WORLD'S LARGEST TRADING COMPANY—THOUSANDS OF NATIVES PROFIT FROM IT BUT THOUSANDS MORE DISLIKE AND FEAR IT

Promptly at 7 a. m., almost as if he had been set off by the strokes of the ship's bells mounted on the wharves below, Cecil Humphrey, manager of the United Africa Co. trading station at Opobo, Nigeria, puts down his cup of tea, dons his white pith helmet, and strides along the palm-bordered graveled walk leading from his house, down the stone stairs to the Dayspring wharf. It looks as if it would be a busy morning. Up river to the left and out of sight around the bend, the yellow tide is dotted with native dugout canoes, their paddles glittering in a bit of sunshine that has managed to slip through the sodden, lowering clouds. Dozens of traders are already unloading their valuable cargoes of palm oil and palm kernels. Among them is L'Nemchaku, one of the great middlemen of the Ibo Tribe, dressed in gold and white like a prophet, and bringing 14 puncheons containing 9 tons of oil worth in all nearly £250; and Mercy Pepple, one of the oldest female traders on the coast, dancing around and chattering, offering a few hundredweight of palm kernels.

Mr. Humphrey's corps of African helpers are already on the job—sampling and grading the kernels with a terrific swagger and flourish, unloading and rolling the puncheons into the storercoms with a straining and groaning and chanting as if each barrel were heavy as a steam roller. There is, however, none of the old struggling and screaming about prices. These are still fixed by the government, and all Mr. Humphrey does is initial the chits for payment after carefully checking them against the produce—£100 for this trader, £8 for that one, £75 10s 5d for the other.

Within the hour a big part of this payment, which can total as much as 40,000 shillings (natives dislike folding money), will be rolling back into Mr. Humphrey's till. For on each wharf is a store belonging to the United Africa Co., or one of its subsidiaries like Miller Bros. or African & Eastern whose names are preserved because some traders long ago pinned their loyalty to them. But here again is no bargaining palaver, no wrangling among the stores for the traders' custom. Nearly all the stores are owned by UAC, prices are controlled, and the stocks of flamboyant cottons, cigarettes, salt, and so on, are so low that everything not reserved for favored traders is snapped up at once. The West African describes a superior object as "fine pass" this or that, and the finest of all as "fine pass kerosene." "Fine pass kerosene," duly says the clerk, displaying a dubious roll of United States-made shirting. "Everything fine pass kerosene today," comments the trader mournfully. And in terms of price and scarcity, everything is. Last year Mr. Humphrey bought upward of £200,000 worth of palm oil and palm kernels, and one of the major sorrows of his life is that he couldn't sell as many pounds' worth of merchandise because it wasn't there.

TRADING ON THE GRAND SCALE

Compressed into a single instance and oversimplified, this is the current success story of the United Africa Co., Ltd., the biggest enterprise in all Africa, the world's largest trading company—and a wholly owned subsidiary of the Anglo-Dutch Lever Bros. and Unilever combine, whose history was recorded in last month's Fortune. The basic operation at Opobo, one of the last of the old-time river stations, is repeated, on both smaller and larger scale, all over central and west Africa—up at Kano, 700 miles north, the world's greatest groundnut (peanut) market, capital of the Hausa Tribe, the largest and most ancient Mohammedan city west of Istanbul, where the howl of the muezzins wakes you at daybreak every morning; over at Ibadan, the largest and most "modern" city of Nigeria, where nearly half a million people spawn and trade under an ocean of galvanized-iron roofs. Last year UAC bought nearly $115,000,000 worth of African produce from natives and their middlemen, raised $6,000,000 worth of oil on its plantations in West Africa and the Congo; took in some $8,000,000 from its 518 craft on the Niger and the Congo and from its wholly owned line, which operates a 15-ship, 120,000-ton fleet between the United Kingdom and West Africa. On the other side of the ledger, it sold nearly $145,000,000 worth of merchandise, mostly in West Africa and the Congo. (For an account of the odds and ends of its operations see the note on page 132.)

All this amounts to nearly $300,000,000 worth of business—about 45 percent of the produce buying and 30 percent of the merchandise sales in all West Africa, and nearly as much in the Congo.[1] This great territory stretches more than 3,000 miles from the hump of West Africa in Senegal through the Congo to East Africa. It includes British, Belgian, French, Portuguese, and Spanish colonies, which have different customs and degrees of development but are alike in that they are more than 99 percent native and more than 99 percent illiterate. Its area is roughly equal to that of the United States, and its population is some 50,000,000. UAC's great strength and two-thirds of its business lie in the Gold Coast and Nigeria, the latter now the largest country (23,000,000 approximately) under the British Colonial Office, where it alone does 60 percent of the buying and nearly half the merchandise sales. Eight other relatively small European companies, with which it is on the best of terms, do the bulk of the rest. Wherever you go in this region—the size of Germany, France, and Italy combined—UAC is supreme. Its stores and warehouses seem to take up half the town, its trading posts cover the bush, its managers' houses are the finest, and its managers' "chop" (African for food) the best. "UAC be government," say the natives, logically identifying the most important and powerful organization in the land with the official manifestation of power.

UAC of course is not the government. It is simply in the position of doing a large part of the business there and maintaining commercial relations, free of antitrust legislation, with the rest. UAC is disliked by the people. It is disliked and feared all the more because the people can't do much about it, because their whole economic present and future seem bound to it—and because they are black and largely primitive and prone to distrust and dislike even the most uncommercial Europeans.

FROM COMPETITION TO COMBINATION

It took a long while to achieve this uncomfortable eminence, but in some ways it surely would have pleased the man who started it all. He was the extraordinary William Hesketh Lever, the Viscount Leverhulme, of the Western Isles, founder of Lever Bros., who about the turn of the century was driving toward the domination of the British soap industry. Tropical oils were already being refined and used instead of tallow for both soap and margarine, and the monopoly-minded Lever wanted to be sure of his raw materials. Having bought 200,000 acres and planted 17,000 acres of coconut palms in the Solomons, he turned his attention to Africa, whose principal oils were and are palm oil and palm-kernel oil, squeezed from the fruit of the oil-palm tree. This fruit, growing in huge clusters, somewhat resembles tiny, 3-inch coconuts. The farmers shin up the tall trees, pick the fruit by hand, and extract oil from the pericarp by stewing it and squeezing it in a crude press. And in their spare time their women crack the nuts, whose kernels are nearly always exported and pressed abroad.

This method not only wastes time and oil but produces a low-grade oil with a high free-fatty-acid content; and at the outset Lever, who certainly had what Americans used to call vision, wanted to mechanize the process of decortication and expressing the palm oil, and to grow the palms on plantations, where the yield and quality per tree could be more than doubled. When Lever tried to do business, however, he banged up against British protectorate policy, forbidding Europeans to buy Nigerian land or even lease it for long terms. This idealistic policy was and is based on preserving native land-tenure laws and on the concept of trusteeship, of saving Africa for the Africans and letting their wants determine their development; and although the arguments against it have increased in cogency with time, Parliament and the colonial office, determined to protect the natives against the soap boilers of the world, have clung to it.

Lever stormed and raved, but all he could do was buy a small trading company, put up an experimental kernel-crushing mill, and stamp off to the Belgian Congo. This land, whose moral atmosphere was so magnificently rendered in Joseph Conrad's Heart of Darkness, was just then struggling out from under Leopold II's atrocious exploitation. The Belgian authorities, looking for a new enlightened system, gave Lever a cordial reception. In 1911 he founded the Huileries du Congo Belge, with a concession to develop 1,875,000 acres provided he paid agreed minimum wages, established schools, hospitals, etc. Today Huileries du Congo Belge has nearly all its acreage in oil palms, 80,000 on a plantation basis, employs upwards of 40,000 natives, and produced 37,000 tons of oil and 16,000 tons of kernels last year. Although it technically stems from Huilever, a Belgian subsidiary of Unilever, it is really part of UAC.

In 1920, not long after he had publicly denounced the Nigerian Government for its bureaucratic, highhanded methods, Lever tried again to establish plantations in British West Africa. The Governor of Nigeria, Sir Hugh Clifford, invited him to dinner at Government House in Lagos. The blunt, importunate Lever argued his case violently, while Sir Hugh replied firmly and with some annoyance that the fundamental doctrine of the system of developing agricultural resources through the agency of indigenous inhabitants was the only justification for British rule in tropical countries. The argument got to the point where they would have exchanged blows had they been anything but British. The next day Lever invited Sir Hugh to dine with him on his yacht, the Albion. Sir Hugh declined. "My duty compels me to be hospitable to you," he explained, "but it does not compel me to accept your hospitality."

But Lever was already embarked on a move that was eventually to get him what he wanted. At this time two large outfits did the bulk of the trading. One was the Royal Niger Co., which had operated under a royal charter empowering it to maintain the peace. It achieved a virtual commercial monopoly, but the charter was repealed in 1900, when the government decided to do the governing. Nineteen years later a company called the African & Eastern, a new combination of several small firms, emerged as the Niger's chief rival; and in the boom times toward the end of World War I, A. & E. was as big as Niger. The two became fiercely competitive as only tropical traders can become. Lever thought such competition idiotic, and itched to buy and merge them. Since raw materials were at the highest prices in history, he was prepared to pay appropriately for the companies: £8,500,000 or five and a half times the par value of its shares for the Niger Co., and a complex but costly bid for A. & E. The Niger purchase went through, but the A. & E. deal hung up on litigation. Meantime the bottom fell out of the market, and Lever was probably lucky it did. The beating he took on Niger badly bent Lever Bros., and the loss he would have taken on A. & E. might have broken it.

As it was, the two companies almost competed themselves broke in the early 1920's. They had overextended before and during the war, duplicating stores, warehouses, and trading stations, and were now overpaying traders and brokers. The general unprofitableness of the operation was aggravated by the fact that trading could not be tightly controlled by the home office. Gone were the old days of the palm-oil ruffians, when a shipload of assorted junk, mostly empty gin bottles, was enough to make a man's fortune. Not yet gone were the old and romantic characters like A. C. Butler, the palm-oil king of Opobo, with his enormous and picturesque library and gargantuan palm-oil chops. The palm-oil chop, still the Saturday dish of traders, consists of chicken, prawns, and almost any other available meat or fish cooked in fresh red palm oil and served on rice and fu-fu (mashed yams). Butler and his chieftain friends, sluicing down the gory-looking chop with a bottle of gin apiece, would eat and drink themselves asleep, and part of Butler's special fame derived from his ability to rise early next morning and gorge himself on the remains of the feast. Not yet gone, either, were the days when company-employed traders worked their own little game on the side, buying palm kernels when the price was low and not entering the purchase on the books until the price reached its peak. And by no means gone were the competitive days when a trader used every trick and strategy ever heard of to take business away from another trader.

By 1929, A. & E. was in the hands of the bankers, who brought in Sir Robert Waley Cohen, head of Shell Oil, to run it. One of the first things Sir Robert did was to pick up where Lever had left off and make a deal with Niger to combine on a 50–50 basis. The result was UAC. Not even the combined company could stand the depression, however. It lost millions, had to be written down from £15,700,000 to £11,000,000, and passed almost entirely into the hands of the Unilever interests when A. & E. could not meet its bankers' demands for money. But in 1931 UAC began a housecleaning that is still talked about with awe in the jungles of Nigeria and along the reaches of the Congo. Down to Africa sailed two directors, who then proceeded to reduce the number of stores and the staff of both the West African operation and Huilever's SEDEC (Société Anonyme d'Enterprises Commerciales du Congo Belge) by no less than 60 percent. The operation temporarily killed the company's morale, but it revived its financial standing. By 1933, UAC was in the black again.

One of the three managing directors at that time was a shrewd, intense young man named Frank Samuel, who at 21 had gone into the family musical-instrument business in London. He invented the first portable gramophone, which he called the Decca, for no particular reason except that the name sounded good, and shortly set up the Decca Gramophone Co. Convinced that radio had ruined the phonograph, he sold out the company to its present owners for £450,000, made a trip around the world, and looked for something to do. His friend, Sir Robert Waley Cohen, asked him to take a whack at merchandising with UAC. Mr. Samuel took a whack and was at the point of giving up when he decided to go to Africa and have a look for himself.

There he changed his mind so effectively that in 1931 he was appointed a director, and early in the war, when the other two directors went into government service, he took over. Some idea of the importance Unilever attaches to its biggest subsidiary may be derived from the management set-up of UAC. Chairman is the famous Viscount Trenchard, marshal of the Royal Air Force, Chief of Staff of the British Air Staff from [1] Besides those under UAC's jurisdiction, Unilever's African interests include soap and margarine factories and food-processing companies in South Africa, the Rhodesias, Nyasaland, and West Africa.

1918 to 1929, who fought for 7 years in Nigeria at the beginning of the century and knows the country well. He has been chairman since 1936. The rest of the board consists of 15 members, including, besides Mr. Samuel, 4 other members of the Unilever board: Geoffrey Heyworth and Paul Rykens, chairmen of the parent companies, Sir Herbert Davis, and R. H. Muir. No other Unilever subsidiary has such a team at its head or is so closely integrated with the parent board.

EVERY PRICE HAS ITS COSTS

In the last few years UAC has achieved what no company in Africa has enjoyed since the days of the Royal Niger—stability in both buying and selling, an almost complete hegemony of the field; and the irony in the fact that the wartime controls of the government have helped the company to its unprecedented heights is surely not lost on Mr. Samuel, whose devotion to success is complemented by a sardonic sense of humor. And UAC is successful. Last year profits, after taxes, were somewhat more than $10,000,000, or nearly a quarter of Unilever's consolidated profits, or about 4 percent on UAC's sales and 18 percent on its original capitalization.

What this success means will become clear after we consider the nature of UAC's business, its relation to Unilever, and the normal conditions under which it works. Its activities sound simple. Its primary function is to get tropical produce and sell it in the world market (it never buys directly for Unilever), and it naturally would like to see a comfortable spread between the price it pays and the price it sells for. In the early days a trading company kept native prices low by offering the cheapest possible merchandise for the biggest possible amount of produce. Manhattan Island, remember, was bought for $24. But after the transaction became monetized a strange complication set in. As soon as the native got money to spend, and got it from sources other than the traders, the companies found themselves developing merchandising organizations whose prosperity depended on the native's having money to spend—which he did not have when prices were ruinously low. And experience showed that trading companies almost invariably made more money when prices were high than when they were low, and made more money on merchandising. World prices that were too low to cover transportation costs to Europe would mean no business for anybody.

This logic may seem to place Mr. Samuel in an odd, not to say dichotomous, position. As UAC's managing director, charged with making it profitable, he should prefer high world prices. But as a director of UAC's parent, Lever Bros. and Unilever, which buys colossal amounts of fats and oils and converts them into soap and cooking fats and margarine, he should prefer low world prices. It would be easy to conclude that Mr. Samuel is beaten down by the rest of the Unilever board, which theoretically should sweat to drive produce prices as low as possible. As a matter of fact, prices fluctuate regardless of the wishes of Mr. Samuel or Unilever; and it is more valid to conclude that Unilever is more interested in the prosperity of the trading business as owner and buyer than only as a buyer. This is just another way of saying that the Unilever-UAC vertical combine, like most vertical combines, results almost automatically in a corporate urge to balance prices and costs so that each of the company's components turns a profit; and the key to the balance is stable prices. One can believe Geoffrey Heyworth, chairman of Unilever, when he says: "We run our business positively, keep it healthy and growing, and let the chips fall where they may."

So Mr. Samuel is certainly in no danger of going schizoid. He would like to see produce prices comfortably higher—high enough at any rate to keep the produce coming steadily to market. On the other hand, he naturally aims to drive as hard a bargain as he can for the money the native has to spend. To the native chief who remembers fondly only the feast of the feast-or-famine days of competitive buying and selling, such stability seems like a big squeeze play by the trading companies, by the civilized world on the primitive areas, by the white race on the black race.

One reason trading companies in the Tropics formerly competed so savagely was that they had relatively high overhead costs. There are only some 1,125 UAC European employees in West Africa and the Congo, but Europeans in the Tropics are expensive animals. The company provides them with houses and "boys"—its total investment in houses runs into millions—and grants them a month's leave for every 5 months on tour, with round-trip fare to London or Brussels. A few older men are still on a bonus basis, the bonus varying with profits and amounting to as much as twice the salary, but this has been largely supplanted by a pension scheme enabling a man to retire at 53 on half salary—not too early nor too much for anyone who has steamed out the best years of his life in the Tropics, fighting dysentery, consorting with the same bores day after day, swallowing pounds of quinine or atabrine in a futile attempt to forfend malaria, and giving up his children (if he has any) for a dozen years or more because the Tropics are bad for them and there are no schools there anyway. While salaries are not high by American standards—only a few managers make more than $10,000 a year—they are high by colonial standards, and personnel costs impose a fixed burden that can be absorbed successfully only with great volume. Competition, of course, was worst when times were tough and volume hard to come by, and a native would walk 25 miles to save threepence. And the worst competition was provided not by the European companies but by price-cutting Syrians, Lebanese, and Greeks, who slept behind their shop counters, and did not have to worry about houses, bonuses, retirement pensions, district managers, or area supervisors.

SWARMS OF MIDDLEMEN

UAC's chief purchases, in the order named, are palm oil and palm kernels, cocoa, groundnuts, and hides, and it harvests and saws timber. Most of the cocoa comes from the Gold Coast, and most of the rest from Nigeria and the Congo. The company buys this produce in 1,771 stations, some doing a business of $5,000,000 or more a year, others consisting of a native employee or concessionaire on a commission basis, with a stock of matches, cigarettes, soap, tin pans, and plain and printed cotton goods under a little tin-roofed shack of a store.

All these stations, however, are not anywhere near enough to contact the so-called farmers out in the depths of the bush. Native farming consists mainly of climbing oil-palm trees and picking the fruit, knocking pods off cocoa trees at the right time, and cultivating patches of groundnuts; and even when the farmer has enough wives to do the work, he rarely pursues his calling assiduously. In the main, he sells not for the necessities of life, which he raises or picks from trees, but for luxuries like matches, cigarettes, bicycles, sewing machines, gramophones, and Xavier Cugat records.

Partly because he has to be coaxed, partly because he is so inaccessible, a hierarchy of native middlemen factors or brokers has risen up to fetch his produce to market and to take merchandise to him. Local brokers sell to district middlemen, the district middlemen to lower middlemen, and so on. In 1937 there were some 1,500 brokers or factors and 37,000 subbrokers in the Gold Coast; no attempt was made to estimate the number in Nigeria, but it probably exceeded 100,000. The one big ambition of the smart West African native, male or female, as soon as he or she donned a loin cloth and began to comprehend the weird and intricate ways of the white man, was to forsake the jungle and become a trader or middleman. But, of course, the middleman needed money, and the only way European firms could get produce was to advance the money to the brokers, who advanced it to the middlemen at 40 to 50 percent interest, and so on down the line to the farmer. The native brokers, like the white traders of an earlier day, quickly found out that the capital they had to work with presented tempting opportunities for cleaning up on their own.

A good example of how they worked is provided by the prewar cocoa situation. As the buyer of 40 percent of the cocoa in the Gold Coast and in Nigeria (the source of half the world's supply), UAC advanced hundreds of thousands of pounds to brokers. They in turn would buy cocoa at, say £25, and enter their purchases on the books at £30 or £35 if the price later went up that far, but at the actual buying figure if it fell; with the result that the European companies were left holding the bag no matter which way the market happened to go. UAC claims it lost £1,338,000 in cocoa buying between 1930 and 1937, overpaying brokers by some £350,000.

So practically all the European firms got together and formed a cocoa-buying pool that divided the market and "stabilized" prices. Just about this time, the world price of cocoa, influenced chiefly by the decline in New York prices, fell abruptly. The bewildered natives and their chiefs could not or did not want to understand the reason and blamed the price decline on the buying pool. They organized a strike or "hold-up," and native sales and merchandise purchases fell off to practically nothing. The British Government investigated, and printed a report recommending, among other things, a farmers' cooperative to eliminate usury, misweighing, and other abuses of the middleman system.

But shortly afterward the war began, and the British Government, through traders, did all the buying. It still has a monopoly on West African cocoa, and with the world price around £250 a ton, it is buying cocoa for around £75 a ton, and has already made a profit of some £20,000,000. The Colonial Office says it will set aside these profits to bolster the price in future years at about the level it is paying now, and despite the howls and laments of American chocolate makers apparently intends to continue price controls indefinitely. Through the 1946–47 season it fixed not only prices but buying quotas, the latter on an "as is" or "past-performance" basis. UAC had no kick coming; it made at least a decent profit and any kind of stability was better than the old-time anarchy. Last fall, however, the Government suddenly knocked the props out from under this stability by canceling quotas but still continuing to fix the buying price. The companies must theoretically now bid for tonnage with very little room to bid in, and some kind of buying agreement is obviously in the offing.

Wartime price controls had and still have a salutary effect on other produce. UAC (and its predecessors) had habitually made trade agreements with European competitors—firms like Paterson Zochonis, of Manchester; Compagnie Française de l'Afrique Occidentale, of Marseille; John Holt & Co., of Liverpool. But it had no sooner made agreements than new competitors began to take advantage of the opoprtunity—just as the textbook says they should. In the late 1920's, for example, the European firms at Kano got together, agreed on prices, and made allocations of groundnuts, and it looked as if they would enjoy the blessings of stability. But a Tripolitan named S. Raccah got into the export trade, offered native middlemen and other sellers a better price than the European firms. He went broke in the middle 1930's, but came back strong by working hard and late, dealing through brokers in Europe, and dickering for lower than conference steamship rates. By 1938 he was exporting a third of the groundnut crop, and of course the European agreement in effect broke down. The war intervened, and the British Ministry of Food controlled and set quotas for West African produce, allocating UCA nearly half of the groundnut crop on a 3-year average.

The only noteworthy UAC activity that perhaps hasn't gained by Government controls is the practically noncompetitive lumber and timber business, which accounts for a rather small part of the company's revenues and an undisclosed but certainly very nice part of its profits. It harvests tropical timber of all kinds on a concession basis in the lowland jungles of Nigeria and the Gold Coast, saws it up in a mill at Sapele, Nigeria, and sells the lumber to the Ministry of Supply. A few years ago Mr. Samuel got interested in plywood, and UAC is now completing a huge factory with an annual output of 40,000,000 square feet of 3/16-inch plywood, worth $3,000,000. The mills are on tidewater—logs float from the forests, and lumber and plywood are loaded onto UAC steamers at the door. UAC is spending money on houses and a hospital for 2,000 native workers; and the plywood mill, the first of its kind in the Tropics, involves considerable risk and experiment, including air conditioning to combat humidity. But UAC has to pay the workers only about 50 or 60 cents a day, and the mill is potentially extremely profitable. Another is planned for the Gold Coast.

The British Government may not control the price of lumber and plywood by the time these mills are running, but it surely will control fats and oils for a long time. It seems determined, indeed, to peg them until the world supply, now a bare 17,500,000 tons, is somewhere near the 22,000,000 tons needed to put per capita consumption on a prewar basis. A question that will inevitably arise when controls are repealed concern Unilever's buying power. One of the arguments for the merger of the Dutch margarine and British soap interests that resulted in the Unilever combine was that together they could buy more than a third of the 5,800,000 tons of fats and oils normally handled in international commerce. Unilever was accordingly charged with having a powerful depressing influence on world prices. As we have noted, however, Unilever does not care to see prices depressed too far. And with a Labor government doing the stabilizing, UAC and Unilever have to worry only about the rather interesting charge, sometimes made, that they are running the Labor government. Even if they were, they wouldn't have to; the government's desire to maintain controls happens to coincide with Unilever's yearning for stability.

LEVER'S DREAM COME TRUE

What the Labor government has found out, ironically, is that Unilever's interests and the British national interests coincide so much of the time lately that it is sometimes difficult to recognize the company as the biggest octopus in the whole Old World. And Mr. Samuel's latest accomplishment is not only another example of such a coincidence; it can be interpreted as a victory in the Lever organization's 40-year-old fight with the Colonial Officer over plantation versus native farmer.

In addition to the 80,000 acres of plantations run by Huileries du Congo Belge, UAC Pamol Ltd. operates palm-oil plantations in Nigeria and the Cameroons. The latter dates back to German control and the other to a temporary excess of leniency on the part of the Nigerian Government, which allowed it to be set up as an experiment. The plantations have proved themselves vastly superior to the native farm methods. The forest is cleared and the young palms are planted, and they begin to bear within a few years. Since other trees do not keep the sun from them, they do not grow long trunks, and thus harvesting becomes easier and safer. The trees are more than twice as productive, and the oil is of consistently high quality, being expressed from the pericarp in plants right on the estate. Total cost has been cheaper than the price paid for native produce in all except the deep depression years. And today the finest palm oil can be produced for about half of the £25 a ton that the inferior native product brings. As a result of such differences in cost, the plantation-farmed Netherlands East Indies passed Nigeria in palm-oil exports in 1936 and the Congo is rapidly catching up.

Whether the plantation is socially superior to native farms is not quite so easy to say. The Colonial Office's contention that it would leave the native high and dry when profits fail has not been borne out, for during the depression plantation workers got along somewhat better than farmers. UAC plantations have provided the native much better housing than he has in the bush, plus free hospitals and clinics, schools, medical treatment; and the difference between the Congo plantation worker and bush native in health and general well-being impresses even the most skeptical visitor. Huileries du Congo is starting to raise a herd of cattle to provide red meat for its native employees, and has just founded L'Ecole Supérieure D'Agriculture-Huilever S. A. to teach bright Congolese to become estate managers. The only way native standards can be raised is by increasing native productivity, and the plantation system has done it faster than the slow educational system of the Colonial Office. The counterargument goes that the native on the plantation is deprived of his old village life and of the chance to process his produce as well as raise it, is fastened to a new kind of existence, and robbed of the illusion of running his own affairs. And it may be somewhat idealistic to expect a native to be more advanced than civilized people who have fought for the illusion of running their own affairs.

Neither groundnuts nor cocoa, however, are yet raised on African plantations. There is some doubt about whether cocoa trees could be; the best ground for them in the Gold Coast seems to be the middle of slopes, and it is of course terribly difficult to get enough middles of slopes together to make a plantation. The company, not missing a bet, has nevertheless planted 6,000 experimental acres of cocoa in the Congo. There is no doubt, however, about plantation culture of groundnuts. In 1946, while on a tour of East Africa, Mr. Samuel got the idea of developing huge groundnut farms in the vast uninhabited expanses of East Africa, where the soil seemed about right. But if Unilever proposed to buy hundreds of thousands of acres of land, the native leaders might have been down on its neck. Accordingly, Mr. Samuel developed the idea on a colossal three-and-one-quarter-million-acre basis, which no private company could very well swing, and turned it over to the Ministry of Food as Unilever's contribution to the solution of the world fats-and-oils shortage.

The ministry sent out a mission to report on the proposal. Soon after the mission returned, Food Minister Strachey, author of The Coming Struggle for Power, got up in Parliament and explained the scheme, adding that His Majesty's Government had asked UAC (one of the favorite targets of his Socialist friends) to manage the undertaking until it was in production. It was almost as if Churchill got up and said he wanted Aneurin Bevan as Prime Minister. There was derisive laughter from the right, and sharp questions from the left, and Strachey could only reply that UAC had the experience and that was that. And only last November 6, Mr. Strachey again gave the company a pat on the back. "I believe that the UAC and all those who have been officially and unofficially responsible for the very rapid launching of Operation Groundnuts deserve well of the people of Great Britain."

UAC not only started the project, it did so without fee. Yet this was not wholly an eleemosynary gesture. Eventually the plantations may produce 600,000 tons of nuts a year, more than Nigeria's exports of palm kernels and groundnuts combined, and the oil will not only enable Unilever to make more soap and margarine but will almost certainly have a stabilizing effect on world prices. As the world's largest buyer of fats and oils, Unilever will benefit immensely. And if the day again comes when there is a glut, Nigerian farmers will doubtless pay for the illusion of running their own affairs—unless the Nigerian Government promotes its own plantation schemes. In that sense the groundnut scheme was a victory for UAC—and for the ideas and ambitions of old Lever himself.

TROUBLE IN PARADISE

Meantime, the native farmers are making a lot of money and UAC is making a lot of money taking their money. Probably no company in the world sells a wider variety of merchandise. More than a third of its $145,000,000 sales comes under the general heading of textiles—180,000,000 yards a year—consisting mostly of cotton baft (heavy gray goods), and gaudy but imaginative cotton prints, carefully designed to satisfy the wierd and changing taste in each section of the country. Next on the list, accounting for about 10 percent of sales, are cigarettes. After that come salt and anything else any department store can conceivably carry, from Sunlight soap made in the local factory to Czech hardware and gas engines and wine and cosmetics and machetes and General Motors refrigerators and cars. More than three-quarters of UAC's sales are wholesale, made in small, dumpy holes in the wall bearing the name of a predecessor or subsidiary like W. B. MacIver, which markets most of the company's textiles. As a matter of general policy, UAC wants to forsake retailing almost entirely and leave it to the African. With that aim in mind it is refurbishing and concentrating its retail activities in a chain of modern, sometimes elegant Kingsway stores, nearly half of whose customers are Europeans, and will maintain them mostly as show places and pilot plants.

The story of merchandising competition is the same as that of produce competition; it used to be devastating. Besides the European companies, there were upstart Greek and Levantine traders who showed a dismaying ability to cut prices, squeeze along, and stay in business. They even decided to import for themselves, a decision that Manchester and German textile manufacturers were only too glad to abet for a while—until one Syrian ordered a lot of textiles from Manchester and refused to accept them when they arrived. When they were auctioned off, his confederate, supplied with the Syrian's cash, got them for about 60 cents on the dollar. Of another shrewd trader his competitors say he hires a claque to stir up a crowd, whereupon he sells a piece of baft, say, at 25 percent below going price in the morning and gradually raises the price as the crowd gathers and the day wears on.

As times picked up, UAC and eight other companies, accounting for the bulk of the merchandise trade, got together and succeeded in stopping the cutthroat competition effectively enough to double mark-ups on some items. This get-together is frequently confused with the Association of West African Merchants, an entirely different body comprising the principal trading firms and founded during World War I. At the outbreak of World War II, the West African and home governments called it into consultation on import controls, price-fixing problems, and schemes for boosting native production. Even the whites, identifying it with high prices, call it the Association of Waylayers and Mercenaries. The get-together is currently unnecessary, for the government still fixes prices and allocates imports, more or less on a past-performance basis, and by and large the situation is beautifully under control for UAC. As a part of a large investment program, UAC has formed a jointly owned construction company with Taylor Woodrow, well-known British contractors, has a one-third interest in a 500,000-gallon brewery being built at Lagos, and is spending $5,000,000 on its river fleet and docks. It is also finishing a banana-flaking plant (to be supplied from its banana plantation in the Cameroons), and planning to produce concentrated orange juice. If anything is to be developed in West Africa UAC will surely have a go at it.

The only notable fly in the ointment is a bold Gold Coast Greek named A. G. Leventis whom UAC sacked in 1936. He had little past performance in most of West Africa, but today he is one of the big retailers in the area. His white, modern, three-story building at Lagos, for example, is always crowded with merchandise and native buyers screaming to be waited on. The question of how Mr. Leventis imported his merchandise was the subject of a government investigation, which mentioned the irregularities of customs officials and United States Army officers. Leventis is unquestionably resourceful. The native is so proficient at the art of drumming that it is sometimes quicker to send messages by drum than by telegraph, and the story goes that Leventis bought up the free time of a whole army of drummers, and that the coastal jungles now vibrate to the Yoruba or Ibo equivalent of "Buy from Leventis—he undersells everybody."

Yet Leventis does not seem to worry UAC too much. Presumably it expects him to sell out as others have sold out when the time is ripe. In any event, UAC has been going its way more or less unconcerned, accumulating its good share of profits and ill will. To be sure, it is blamed for sins it doesn't commit. It is blamed, for example, for the fact that most of the stuff it imports reaches the native consumer at anything from 100 to 500 percent above what it should sell for. Actually, UAC sells to middlemen traders at government-fixed prices, and the traders sell and resell the stuff for whatever traffic will bear. Caustic soda, used by local soap makers and dyers, is very scarce, and last August caustic soda sold by UAC for $9 a ton was fetching $88 a ton in the free market. The natives have accused UAC of taking advantage of the situation by making traders take some of the things they don't want in order to get other things they do want.

The traders themselves are far from blameless. In Ibadan, last August, Yoruba female traders had overstocked themselves with Guinea gold cigarettes and were selling them in the street at less than wholesale price, hoping, in the words of one UAC man, "that their big orders of cigarettes would entitle them to better allocation of scarce stuff, which they could mark way up." This is a variation of an old prescarcity practice known as gold coasting, or buying easily salable items on chit, selling them below cost if necessary, and lending the cash to needy traders or natives at 30 or 40 percent.

Last June the natives of Ibadan, led by a youth movement called the Discrimination Watch Committee and the newly formed Ibadan Wholesalers and Retailers Union, protested tie-in sales, unsuitable merchandise, and what they thought was the European importers' partiality for profiteering Syrian traders. They organized an effective boycott. "Never thought they could do it," admits a UAC man. "Anyway, the reason Africans complain about the inordinate profits of the Syrians is they want to make the profits."

Whatever the facts, UAC settled the boycott by agreeing to create 50 African traders at the expense of the Syrians, and so far it has found 14 natives capable of being made traders. The settlement, reached only after the Africans had demonstrated their strength, obviously did not do UAC any good. It strengthened the native's antagonism to the company and, more important, gave him confidence in his ability to fight it. As every company knows, a strike means bitterness, and losing a strike means losing prestige. In UAC's case the loss was even more severe because the strikers had different-colored skins and a different psychology.

THE WHITE MAN'S BURDEN

Nineteen years after its founding, UAC has arrived at an admirable commercial supremacy. Although its relations with the natives are better than they used to be they have not yet matched its commercial progress. The company is probably still vulnerable commercially—a new American or British company with plenty of Negroes in its management might give it a devastating ride. UAC is also vulnerable to public opinion. Now that India is practically independent. West Africa is one of the most critical frontiers on earth, one of the few remaining chances for liberal western civilization to give a good account of itself. As the dominant enterprise in this area, UAC has to define success as a performance that does credit not only to itself but to the free-enterprise system. It has to bridge the gap between the middle 1800's and middle 1900's.

This is not an easy job, and there is much to be said for UAC. It is not and cannot be expected to be responsible for 50,000,000 Africans. To assure every native connected with the fats-and-oils business a decent living by European standards, soap and margarine would have to sell for $5 a pound. The West African economy cannot be appraised in terms of the European or American social or economic clichés any more than its living standards can be assessed in terms of American standards. The seeming rapacity of the trading companies often sprang from the competitive spirit that is the legal ideal of United States industry. Competitive assailability created the will to monopoly; trading companies have abused their position in one place to recover what they lost by excessive competition in another.

Under ordinary circumstances, a company could partly compensate for all this by wise, deft handling of personnel relationships. Even this is not so easy as it sounds. The bulk of the natives are not only illiterate, they are stupid, listless, and exasperating, as Europeans would be if they and their families were plagued with malnutrition, malaria, dysentery, yaws, sleeping sickness, leprosy, and outsized umbilical hernias. The average native knows the European mostly in the relation of boy or servant to master. This is partly unavoidable, because nearly all Europeans in UAC territory are executives of one kind or another, and would be masters if their employees were white. Anyway, the average native almost compels the European to be the white master. Accustomed to the most despotic kind of rule by his native overlords, he regards the European who tries to be democratic as a weakling and a fool. He responds to being treated fairly—a circumstance overlooked by many white masters—but the fact remains that he seems to perform best when treated firmly. So the average European inevitably regards him as a child, and is disposed to treat him economically as a child.

Complicating all this are the native workers' low wages—as low as 20 cents a day, with "cola" (cost-of-living allowance), housing, and other benefits bringing the grand total up by 50 percent—while merchandise is generally higher in Africa than in Britain. Naturally, a bicycle or a bottle of hair straightener costs a little more in Africa than it does 5,000 miles closer to the place it was made; and the African, until he is more productive, cannot expect to earn as much as European labor. (To pay him high wages now in the last analysis would be to do him out of a job.) Which is not to say that European companies do not take advantage of low prevailing scales, set by governments, the largest employers of native labor, to get productive jobs filled cheaply.

As for the literate African, he would be hard to handle even if he were getting a much better deal economically and were always treated as the adult he is. Neither the British nor French in West Africa nor the Belgians in the Congo tolerate the color line that is a feature of life in South Africa as well as the American deep South. But the mere absence of a formal color lines does not affect things very much. The more enlightened the native, the more he is aware that his brothers and uncles and aunts come closer to monkeys than Europeans seem to; and unless he is a man of immense talent, all the confidence he can muster in himself and all he knows about the stupidity and venality of the white man isn't enough to cover his discomfort.

The situation presents obvious and enormous opportunities for a demagog, and one has appropriately arisen. The most publicized native in West Africa is one Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe, better known as Dr. Zik, a well-educated man with a gift for noble phraseology. He prints several Nigerian papers, and his program is independence for Nigeria, justice for the Africans, "the right to work if a man has to," freedom from UAC, the destruction of AWAM, and so on. Frequently he is unintentionally funny. One of his papers recently created a particularly anguished furor with the news that a UAC manager employed a dog as night watchman at a higher wage than he paid some of his help. Dr. Zik's editors missed the point. This manager, who has since been fired, used the dog to patrol his place and hit upon the whimsical and touching idea of entering the dog's name on his pay roll along with several fictitious names.

Of Dr. Zik and his papers and activities it is fair to observe they are one of the best arguments extant for making Nigeria a crown colony, but his line nevertheless is sometimes just and generally plausible—and packs a big appeal. Dr. Zik cannot be pooh-poohed, as he is, on the ground that only a small literate minority knows him. UAC and the other Europeans almost certainly underestimate him, just as they tend to underestimate the forces that have generated him.

UAC has done something to improve its relations with the natives. It has appointed a personnel manager, and has sent several of its African managers on extended trips through the United Kingdom. It has set up pensions and sick-leave benefits. For economy as well as good will it makes a policy of upgrading native personnel to managerial jobs as soon as they can handle them. In Togoland, all its staff is African. Although Africans are generally paid considerably less for the same work, most students of West African economics agree that equal pay for equal work would be a mistake. It costs the European much more than the native to live in the tropics, and a European scale for the African, besides being too far out of line with the lowest native wages, would tend to keep him out of government and business jobs that he should be trained to hold. But even when the native sees the point of this concept, which he rarely does, he naturally believes that UAC abuses it. During the war, UAC upgraded many Africans, and in the inevitable housecleaning after the war some lost out. The instinctive native reaction that the company was reviving color discrimination was taken up by the Zik press.

What UAC has on its hands, in other words, is a full-blown public-relations race problem about which it ought to do more than it has done. It could, for example, give thoroughgoing courses in race relations to young trainees and future managers, who now go down to Africa with only their own wisdom and imperfect knowledge to guide them. London seems to have decided it has a responsibility to the native, and Lord Trenchard has stated that it is UAC policy to cooperate more and more with colonial governments, but the company surely has not been able to sell itself or its good intentions to the natives. It might well study the methods of old Lord Leverhulme, who was as hardboiled as they come but knew what he was up against. "A native," he wrote in 1924, "cannot organize. He cannot run even a wooding post on the river satisfactorily." Nevertheless he felt that it was important to generate their good will, and suggested the publication of a magazine for African distribution with a cover showing a white hand clasping a black one and helping the native up a hill. The diagram might make a few sophisticated Africans guffaw, but the motive behind the idea is today more relevant than ever.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, some of the slaves of this great monopoly become educated. At the bottom of page 64 there are pictures of some of the natives, accompanied by the following note:

The fatalistic Mohammedan Hausa and Fulani of northern Nigeria (middle photo) boast a civilization that hasn't changed in a thousand years, yet is centuries ahead of the Congolese. Along the seaboard, the Sierra Leone and Gold Coast natives are considered most adaptable to European ways, with Yorubas and Ibos of southern Nigeria close behind. "And when they advance, that's when they get hard to handle," says a UAC official.

When they get a little education, they become hard to handle. I can understand that a man getting 20 cents a day, when he finds out how much people get in other parts of the country, may become rather hard to handle.

We turn now to page 132. I ask unanimous consent that the article in the box, entitled "The Foundlings on the Doorstep," be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FOUNDLINGS ON THE DOORSTEP

"There are lots of funny bits lying about the company," says Geoffrey Heyworth, chairman of Unilever Brothers & Unilever Ltd. "It is like having a foundling on the doorstep; you don't slit its throat, you bring the thing in and take a look at it." Mr. Heyworth was talking about several odd, detached, and very profitable activities of United Africa Co. that function under an odd, detached, and profitable man named John Wigrain Shepherd. Most of them date back to the exploits of a director of African & Eastern (one of UAC's predecessors), Maj. Gen. W. H. Grey, C. B., C. M. G., who during and after World War I picked up a lot of bargains for his company in the Near East. He bought into the business of buying and shipping dates out of Iraq, and UAC now ships 100,000 boxes of the 500,000 going to the United States in the annual date rush. He bought the G. & A. Baker store in Istanbul, which got its start peddling cloth to the members of the Sultan's harem. It lost money for a long time, but now does very well indeed, has gone into the wholesale business, and exports and imports everything from airplanes to tobacco (it sold 200 de Havillands last year). In Iran, Iraq, Mesopotamia, and Syria, UAC buys wool from the tails of desert sheep, much in demand by United States carpetmakers. In the Canary Islands it runs a general import-export business, importing grain and maize from Argentina and water pumps from the United States, and exporting tobacco and highly profitable homemade cigarettes to Spain. In Morocco it specializes in importing Chinese green tea, a staple of Moroccan diet, and exports Moroccan leather, which really comes across the desert from Kano, Nigeria. Finally, it scrapes a few thousand dollars worth of guano off one of the Seychelles, north of Madagascar. All these activities gross it around $8,000,000 and make it a good fat profit. As Mr. Heyworth says, "When profitable loose ends can be tacked on by ad hoc methods, why throw them out?"

Mr. LANGER. I now come to page 134, a continuation of the article previously placed in the RECORD, discussing the monopoly. The little children in America buy Hershey bars, for example, on every one of which England, in control of Africa, makes an outrageous profit. Hershey and other chocolate bars are made from cocoa. Reading from page 134:

A good example of how they worked is provided by the prewar cocoa situation. As the buyer of 40 percent of the cocoa in the Gold Coast and in Nigeria (the source of half the world's supply)—

The article is dealing with the monopoly—

UAC advanced hundreds of thousands of pounds to brokers. They in turn would buy cocoa at, say, 25 pounds, and enter their purchases on the books at 30 pounds or 35 pounds if the price later went up that far, but at the actual buying figure if it fell; with the result that the European companies were left holding the bag no matter which way the market happened to go. UAC claims it lost 1,338,000 pounds in cocoa buying between 1930 and 1937, overpaying brokers by some 350,000 pounds.

What happened?

So practically all the European firms got together—

Here is where our American boys again got gypped—

and formed a cocoa-buying pool that divided the market and stabilized prices. Just about this time, the world price of cocoa, influenced chiefly by the decline in New York prices, fell abruptly. The bewildered natives and their chiefs could not or did not want to understand the reason and blamed the price decline on the buying pool. They organized a strike or holdup, and native sales and merchandise purchases fell off to practically nothing. The British Government investigated, and printed a report recommending, among other things—

What did they recommend? They recommended a farmers' cooperative—a farmers' cooperative, such as the Tax Equality League wanted us to put out of business. When they got all through, that is what they recommended, some 35 years ago.

The British Government investigated, and printed a report recommending, among other things, a farmers' cooperative to eliminate usury, misweighing, and other abuses of the middleman system.

But shortly afterward the war began, and the British Government, through traders, did all the buying. It still has a monopoly on West African cocoa, and with the world price around 250 pounds a ton, it is buying cocoa for around 75 pounds a ton, and has already made a profit of some 20,000,000 pounds.

That is, they buy it for around 75 pounds a ton, and sell it for about 250 pounds a ton.

The Colonial Office says it will set aside these profits to bolster the price in future years at about the level it is paying now, and despite the howls and laments of American chocolate makers apparently intends to continue price controls indefinitely. Through the 1946–47 season it fixed not only prices but buying quotas, the latter on an "as is" or "past performance" basis.

Further on, at page 136, the article says:

The British Government may not control the price of lumber and plywood by the time these mills are running, but it surely will control fats and oils for a long time. It seems determined, indeed, to peg them until the world supply, now a bare 17,500,000 tons, is somewhere near the 22,000,000 tons needed to put per capita consumption on a prewar basis. * * * One of the arguments for the merger of the Dutch margarine and British soap interests that resulted in the Unilever combine was that together they could buy more than a third of the 5,800,000 tons of fats and oils normally handled in international commerce. Unilever was accordingly charged with having a powerful depressing influence on world prices.

There was one fellow over there who objected to the monopoly. His name was Zik. He is a well-educated man, with a gift for noble phraseology. So that everyone who reads the RECORD may know what happened to him when he fought this gang, I ask unanimous consent to have that part of the article, commencing on page 142, with the paragraph starting with the words "the situation presents," through to the end of the article on page 144, inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the portion of the article referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. At this point, if the Senator from North Dakota will permit, the Chair lays before the Senate a telegram from Richard L. Duncan, of the Falls Cities Cooperative Milk Producers' Association, Louisville, Ky., relating to the repeal of oleomargarine taxes. Without objection, the telegram will be printed in the RECORD, and lie on the table. The Chair hears no objection.

The telegram was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOUISVILLE, KY., January 9, 1950.

Mrs. FLO BRATTON,
Office, Vice President, Senate Office Building:

Will you please convey to Mr. BARKLEY the following message?

The real issue in the oleo controversy is the color, yellow. Our amendment takes tax off all oleo and it is not our desire to prohibit sale of oleo; every day that our 65,000,000 meals served in public eating places you and I and other millions cannot tell difference between butter and high-grade oleo product colored yellow. The three alternates in oleo bill for identification purposes will not be effective and cannot be enforced. Our bill leaves color issue up to individual States. Since dairy farmers' amendment takes tax off oleo and complies with Democratic platform relative to oleo legislation, we sincerely request that you ask administration and leaders to reverse pressure and line up with two and one-half million dairy farmers. The present administration objective merely aids 30 oleo manufacturers who have stirred up consumers on tax issue with $6,000,000 worth of propaganda. Please help us to get a square deal. Thanks.

RICHARD L. DUNCAN,
Falls Cities Cooperative Milk Producers Association.

Mr. LANGER. We now come to volume 3 of Fortune, with its article concerning this great monopoly. It is the issue of February 1948. As I said, the first one was the issue of December 1947, the next, January 1948. I want to quote what one of their directors said. Perhaps some of those who have been voting to give billions of dollars away will not be quite so anxious to continue doing so when they understand the attitude of certain people. The article gives the names. It shows that this outfit has directors. This great trust operates in the United States, the general manager of which is in charge of the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners for the Democratic Party—the one man they chose out of 150,000,000 other persons in the United States.

Let me tell the Senate where this outfit operates and where it has its factories.

It has factories in Belgium, Denmark, France, Finland, Germany, Netherlands, Italy, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Hungary, Yugoslavia, Rumania, Belgian Congo, Burma, China, India, Ceylon, Siam, Newfoundland, Canada, British East Africa, and Egypt.

When the Democrats looked around for a good general manager, one who had a wide acquaintance, they certainly chose a good man, because his companies operate in all these countries, and he can sell tickets at $100 apiece to Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners.

I continue: Palestine, North and South Rhodesia, Union of South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, Pakistan, Philippine Republic, Malaya, Netherlands East Indies, and the Solomon Islands.

It may be that the Democrats should give a prize to those who sell the most tickets to the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners.

This monopoly also has factories in Uruguay, Argentina, Chile, Brazil, and the Canary Islands.

I do not know whether there will be any canaries singing at the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. THYE. To what kind of plants is the Senator referring?

Mr. LANGER. I am referring to the plants of this one giant monopoly, the chairman of which is the general manager of the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners for the Democratic Party.

Mr. THYE. In what are they engaged?

Mr. LANGER. They are engaged in manufacturing margarine.

Mr. THYE. And selling it?

Mr. LANGER. Yes.

Mr. THYE. If they should be permitted to color oleomargarine without paying a Federal tax, the ability of this great organization to make sales would make it possible to flood this country with oleomargarine to such an extent that butter would no longer be found on the market.

Mr. LANGER. That is exactly the point. They are hiring native labor at 20 cents a day.

Mr. THYE. With such sales ability they could sell oleomargarine to persons who did not even want to use it. Will the Senator give us the name of the corporation, in order that we shall not lose sight of the Senator's argument?

Mr. LANGER. It is known as Lever Bros. in the United States, and outside the United States it is known as Unilever, Ltd.

Mr. THYE. What is the name of the general manager?

Mr. LANGER. Charles Luckman. I want the Senator to see his picture.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. THYE. Does the Senator think that the butter and milk producers of North Dakota would have any chance to sell their product against such ability as that which the Senator has indicated?

Mr. LANGER. I can quote a letter from the dairy commissioner of North Dakota, William J. Murphy, saying that that kind of competition would be absolutely ruinous to the dairy farmers.

Mr. THYE. The very backbone and strength of the producers in the Senator's State, as well as the Minnesota producers, are the dairy farmer and the livestock man, because they can weather a drought and can carry livestock through even an extremely dry season, which would kill the wheat and barley crops. But if this international organization, with its ability to sell, and its ability to capture man's imagination by pictures and artistic drawings, could take the market, the farmer, who is dependent on his small cream check, would be put out of business. That is what the Senator is trying to show us, is it not?

Mr. LANGER. I may say to the distinguished Senator that when the drought was very severe in the Northwestern States, butterfat dropped to 16 cents, but the farmers were able to exist because even at 16 cents they could manage to make a small amount of profit. I assure the Senator, however, that if this outfit comes into the United States, spending $50,000,000 for advertising, how, in heaven's name, can the farmers of the Northwest compete?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Is it not a fact that this outfit is already in the United States—the John Jelke Co.?

Mr. LANGER. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Is it not a fact that the president of that company said that the oleomargarine plants under the control of this company would be the biggest oleomargarine plants in the world?

Mr. LANGER. That is their boast.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It is a company which now produces 75 percent of all the oleomargarine for Europe, outside the Soviet Union, and we are asked to place our dairy farmers and independent operators against that sort of an industrial giant.

Mr. LANGER. That is correct. The people took the Democratic Party at its word, and the dairy farmers helped to elect that party, acting upon the word of the President of the United States in his Philadelphia speech.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Does the Senator recall that yesterday, when I was delivering my remarks, I made some mention of the fact that the farmers of this country had some idea of what was in the platform, speaking of the Democratic Party platform?

Mr. LANGER. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I also went on to say that the farmers had something to do with the result of the election, and I pointed out that no monopoly was going to be able to do for the people of the country what the farmers were able to do for them.

I further pointed out that this was not an issue as to whether oleo was to the best interests of the consumer, but an issue between the independent operator and a giant international cartel which has been masquerading around this country until I think it has even fooled the Democratic Party. I do not suppose there is one Democrat out of a million who realizes the connections and ramifications of this international cartel. Many Democrats will be embarrassed after the pronouncements which have been made here by the Senator from North Dakota. I think the best way for them to save their face is to vote for the Gillette-Wiley substitute and to vote down House bill 2023 and investigate this oleo monopoly and cartel. I think that would save the day, and we could then go home with clean consciences.

Mr. LANGER. I agree with the Senator, but I think we should also investigate how, in heaven's name, the Democratic Party, at a time when the Attorney General of the United States was bringing a case aginst this monopoly, could name the general manager of that outfit as general manager of the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners all over the United States.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I think we as Democrats must say we are deeply indebted to the distinguished Senator from North Dakota on an occasion when it is very difficult to find out his politics. He is a good nonpartisan leader——

Mr. LANGER. I am a good nonpartisan all the time.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is wonderful. It requires that sort of a clean-cut mind frankly to state the case. We did not receive any information from the policy committee of the Republican Party as to what was happening to us. So we want to thank the North Dakota nonpartisan leader for the great insight he has given to us and for the help he has given to some of us who are just as much against monopoly as he is. I may say to him that both the Democrats and the Republicans are somewhat guilty of lip service in the fight against monopoly.

Much talk has been heard throughout the country about monopoly and about our dislike of it, but neither party has had the courage to do much about it. I think one of the reasons for that is that the Republicans are involved in it so deeply they do not dare talk, and the Democrats have been dirtied up with it a little bit so that they do not dare talk. So, not being a monopolist myself, coming from a Democrat-farmer-labor State, at least from a progressive State, where even the Republicans are progressive, I should like to join with the Senator from North Dakota.

Perhaps it would be a good idea for us to join up and call both parties to task and say, let us come clean on the question of trusts, monopolies, and cartels, let us enforce the law, give the antitrust division the money it needs, and not do as we did a few years ago, take away some of the money. Let us give them some of the attorneys they need, too.

Mr. LANGER. One way by which the Senator can do that is to buy a membership in the Non-Partisan League of North Dakota for $16 a year. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. I should be delighted to buy such a membership if I only lived in the great State of North Dakota, but since we are being so gracious to each other, possibly we could exchange honorary memberships. I could give the Senator one of ours in the Democrat-Farmer-Labor Party in Minnesota, which, by the way, is only a dollar [laughter], and I should be glad to accept the $16 one from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. We will negotiate.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Inasmuch as we are talking practical politics, if the Senator feels that what is done will have a great influence on the farmers, it seems to me he might insist that the Democrats are making a great mistake in repealing this law, and then perhaps the Republicans might have a chance to win an election sometime.

Mr. LANGER. The regular Republican Party is not interested in WILLIAM LANGER. I am in a branch of it by myself, the farmer-labor branch of the Republican Party, and I am protecting its interest here today.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. I desire to compliment the distinguished Senator from North Dakota, first, because he has brought to the attention of the country a very significant fact, namely, the choice of Mr. Luckman by the Democrats—I must say that when I have listened to my good friend from Minnesota, this corporation would appear to be lily pure, as he made it out.

The Senator is entitled to credit for having brought to the attention of the country that much of the lip service on the Democratic side of the Senate against what are called trusts, corporate interests, is nothing but lip service.

They have put in charge of the Jackson Day dinner one of the great outstanding economic royalists of the country. What is more, they precipitate, at the same time, into the forum of America the very significant fact, which is entitled to a great deal of consideration, that those who are pushing this fight to take color from butter and give it to oleo are likely to succeed unless we have more men of courage and understanding like the Senator from North Dakota.

I should like to ask a question of the distinguished Senator from North Dakota. Does the Senator remember that it was Lever Bros. who went into court to sustain their right to the color of a certain soap?

Mr. LANGER. Yes; I remember that, and I shall read that into the RECORD later.

Mr. WILEY. That is significant, Mr. President, when we consider not only the 2,500,000 farmers whose economic life is involved, but all the others in the chain of economic living who are connected with the farmers and whose subsistence is dependent upon whether or not the oleo monopoly shall take more of the spread market than they already have. Stop and think of it. The spread market in this country consists of about 2,300,000,000 pounds. Already this year, the evidence shows, oleo interests have captured 40 percent of that spread market, or more than 900,000,000 pounds.

Another significant thing is that less than 10 percent of that spread is in the yellow color. Why do they want to use the yellow color? They want to use it merely just to perpetuate their monopolistic activities.

I should like to say to the Senator that the American people owe him a tremendous debt, because he has demonstrated for the first time on the floor of the Senate the fact that the Democratic Party, which has posed all the time as the party of the people, the party of the common man, as serving the interests of the common man, is now really serving the interests of one of the greatest monopolies, not only in the United States, but in the world.

The distinguished Senator from North Dakota has said something about monopoly in this country. Does he know that this same organization is spending $25,000,000 putting up plants in California? The purpose of that, of course, is to take over the west-coast spread, as we call it. In California the same monopoly has been selling oleomargarine for as low as 20 cents and as high as 60 cents. What is more, in order to capture that spread, they have indulged in the practice of giving to anyone who buys 1 pound of yellow oleomargarine a certificate entitling him to a free pound.

Again I say, let us consider the terrific impact upon the economic life of the country if the business of some 3,000,000 farmers and those who are connected with them is paralyzed. That is something we cannot reckon. It may start a tailspin that cannot be stopped. Personally, I think it would be something really catastrophic.

We have heard on the floor of the Senate debate on danger in the foreign field—in China, in Formosa—and debate about Tito. I think the idea that the green pastures are always farther afield is a wrong philosphy. I think we had better look to our own pastures and see whether or not something should be done here.

I trust that I have given the Senator a sufficient respite so that he can carry on. I thank him for the privilege of interjecting these remarks at this time into his very illuminating address. I say again, I congratulate the Senator. He has brought to the attention of the American people the fact that the Democrats have put at the head of their organization one of the greatest economic royalists in America, and that they now expect they will be able to fool the Senate of the United States into giving back to him a monopoly of the oleomargarine business in America.

Mr. LANGER. I thank the distinguished Senator, and I wish to make it plain that not only is Mr. Luckman's company one of the greatest monopolies, but it is the greatest. This organization is bigger than United States Steel, and bigger than General Motors, far, far bigger. Actually, what the Democrats have done is a shameful, disgraceful thing. It is an insult to every real, true, honest Democrat in this country.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I did not understand the question which the Senator from Wisconsin asked. What was the question he asked?

Mr. LANGER. Whether or not the appointment of this man Luckman was a shame and a disgrace to the Democratic Party, and I said it was. That was the question.

Mr. WILEY. Silence lends consent.

Mr. LANGER. I had not finished giving the names of the countries where this monopoly operates. The list continues:

46. Iraq.
47. Iran.
48. Morocco.
49. Canary Islands.
50. Gambia.
51. Portuguese Guinea.
52. French Guinea.
53. Sierra Leone.
54. Liberia.
55. Ivory Coast.
56. Gold Coast.
57. French Togo.
58. Dahomey.
59. Nigeria.
60. French Equatorial Africa.
61. French Cameroons.
62. Spanish Guinea.
63. Gabon.
64. Belgian Congo.
65. Uganda.
66. Tanganyika.
67. Seychelles.
68. Union of South Africa.

So this outfit is now operating in 68 different countries.

On page 167 is given a list of what this great monopoly sold in 1946. It totals $1,364,147,000. I think the people of the United States are entitled to know what this company is and where it operated, and what it sold and traded in and dealt in. It dealt in household and laundry soaps, in soap powders, in flake soaps, in toilet soaps, in medicated soaps, in scourers, in soapless detergents, and in water softeners.

When it comes to oleomargarine, it has offices in Solo, Belgium; Astra, France and in numerous other countries. The combine sold $216,621,000 worth of oleomargarine, edible oils, and fats in the countries in which it operated. The combine sold canned vegetables, tea, and soups, baby foods, dried fruits, meat and fish pastes.

The combine also sold animal feeding stuffs.

It also sold chemicals, glycerin, bone products, candles, coal, fertilizers, ice, tallow, greases, residues from oil refining, starch derivatives, and received revenue from activities such as printing and packing.

The combine further sold toilet preparations of every conceivable kind, including dental preparations, perfumes, lotions, toilet waters, talcs, shaving cream and sticks, face powders, face creams, shampoos, and hair dressings, and ointments.

Further the combine sold $382,262,000 worth of vegetables and animal oils and fats.

It also sold merchandise in the amount of $143,850,000.

Its produce sales amounted to $114,275,000.

Then it rendered services amounting to $16,269,000 on its steamship line, boats on the Niger and the Congo, and road transport in the United Kingdom.

Mr. President, I shall read a letter from the dairy commissioner of North Dakota, in answer to the question asked by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin respecting this monopoly having brought a lawsuit, to which the dairy commissioner refers in his letter, to prevent the imitation of any one of the products the combine deals in. The letter is dated January 6, 1950, as follows:

DEAR SENATOR: I am again asking for your help in behalf of the dairy farmers of North Dakota. The oleomargarine bill is before the Senate for debate, but I would first like to express the appreciation of the dairy farmers of North Dakota for the assistance you have given us during previous sessions of Congress on this controversial issue.

Mr. President, let me digress to say that when the oleomargarine bill was previously before the Senate I offered an amendment to it which dealt with the subject of civil rights. That was about a year ago. I may say that the pending measure, if passed, will ruin thousands of farmers in the State of North Dakota. They have asked me to present at this time the same amendments to the oleomargarine bill that I presented a year ago. The first amendment I have prepared deals with the poll tax. The amendment is short. I wish to read the important part of it, and I shall offer it as an amendment to the pending measure. I read as follows:

The requirement that a poll tax be paid as a prerequisite to voting or registering to vote at primaries or other elections for President, Vice President, electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, is not and shall not be deemed a qualification of voters or electors voting or registering to vote at primaries or other elections for said officers within the meaning of the Constitution, but is and shall be deemed an interference with the manner of holding primaries and other elections for said national officers and attacks upon the right or privilege of voting for said national officers.

I shall not read the other sections. I offer the amendment as an amendment to the pending bill itself, and not to the Wiley-Gillette substitute.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, does the Senator have any objection to the amendment in full being read at the desk?

Mr. LANGER. I have no objection whatever to the amendment being read by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHOEPPEL in the chair). The clerk will read the amendment as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. LANGER to the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes, viz:

On page 4, line 19, after the word "of", insert "the foregoing provisions of."

On page 5, line 3, strike out the word "This", and insert in lieu thereof "The foregoing provisions of this."

On page 5, after line 6, add the following new sections:

"SEC. . The requirement that a poll tax be paid as a prerequisite to voting or registering to vote at primaries or other elections for President, Vice President, electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, is not and shall not be deemed a qualification of voters or electors voting or registering to vote at primaries or other elections for said officers, within the meaning of the Constitution, but is and shall be deemed an interference with the manner of holding primaries and other elections for said national officers and a tax upon the right or privilege of voting for said national officers.

"SEC. . It shall be unlawful for any State, municipality, or other government or governmental subdivision to prevent any person from voting or registering to vote in any primary or other election for President, Vice President, electors for President or Vice President or for Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, on the ground that such person has not paid a poll tax, and any such requirement shall be invalid and void insofar as it purports to disqualify any person otherwise qualified to vote in such primary or other election. No State, municipality, or other government or governmental subdivision shall levy a poll tax or any other tax on the right or privilege of voting in such primary or other election, and any such tax shall be invalid and void insofar as it purports to disqualify any person otherwise qualified from voting at such primary or other election.

"SEC. . It shall be unlawful for any State, municipality, or other government or governmental subdivision to interfere with the manner of selecting persons for national office by requiring the payment of a poll tax as a prerequisite for voting or registering to vote in any primary or other election for President, Vice President, electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, and any such requirement shall be invalid and void.

"SEC. . It shall be unlawful for any person, whether or not acting under the cover of authority of the laws of any State or subdivision thereof, to require the payment of a poll tax as a prerequisite for voting or registering to vote in any primary or other election for President, Vice President, electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Member of the House of Representatives."

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask that that amendment be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I now send to the desk and ask to have read, an amendment which is an exact copy of the so-called Ferguson antilynching bill. I offer it as an amendment to the pending bill, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table, and that it be read by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be received and printed, and, without objection, the clerk will read it.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. LANGER to the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, and for other purposes, viz:

On page 4, line 19, after the word "of", insert "the foregoing provisions of."

On page 5, line 3, strike out the word "This" and insert in lieu thereof the following "The foregoing provisions of this."

On page 5, after line 6, add the following new sections:

"PURPOSE

"SEC. 7. To guarantee, insofar as it lies within the constitutional power of the Congress so to do within the subject matter of sections 7–18 hereof, (a) that each and every citizen of the United States be secured in the equal protection of the laws of the United States, and of the several States, and (b) that no citizen of the United States be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, the Congress, in the exercise of all powers which it possesses, does hereby legislate with respect to the crime of lynching as hereinafter defined.

"DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 8. Any assemblage of two or more persons which shall, without authority of law, exercise or attempt to exercise, by acts of physical force against person or property, any power of correction or punishment over any person, who is (1) in the custody of any peace officer, or (2) charged with or convicted of the commission of any criminal offense, or (3) suspected by such assemblage of the commission of any criminal offense, with the purpose or consequence of preventing the apprehension or trial or punishment by law of such person, or of imposing a punishment, shall constitute a lynch mob within the meaning of sections 7–18 of this act. Any such exercise of power or attempt to exercise power by a lynch mob shall constitute lynching within the meaning of sections 7–18 of this act.

"CONSPIRACY BETWEEN MEMBERS OF LYNCH MOB AND FEDERAL OR STATE OFFICERS

"SEC. 9. Whenever a lynching occurs, any member of the lynch mob who conspires with any officer or employee of the United States or of a State or governmental subdivision thereof who is charged with the duty or possesses the authority as such officer or employee to prevent the lynching or to protect the person lynched, and any such officer or employee who conspires with any member of the lynch mob, to commit, instigate, incite, organize, aid, or abet the lynching shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 20 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"PUNISHMENT UPON STATE OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES FOR WILLFUL FAILURE TO PREVENT LYNCHING

"SEC. 10. Whenever a lynching shall occur, any officer or employee of a State or any governmental subdivision thereof, who shall have been charged with the duty or shall have possessed the authority as such officer or employee to prevent the lynching, but shall have willfully failed or refused to make all reasonable efforts to do so, and any officer or employee of a State or governmental subdivision thereof who, under authority or duty granted or imposed by law of such State, shall have had custody of the person lynched and shall have willfully failed or refused to make all reasonable efforts to protect such person from lynching, shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 5 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"PUNISHMENT UPON FEDERAL OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES FOR WILLFUL FAILURE TO PREVENT LYNCHING

"SEC. 11. Whenever a lynching shall occur, any officer or employee of the United States, (1) who shall have been charged with the duty or shall have possessed the authority as such officer or employee to prevent the lynching, but shall have willfully failed or refused to make all reasonable efforts to do so; or (2) who, under authority or duty granted or imposed by the law of the United States, shall have had custody of the person lynched and shall have willfully failed or refused to make all reasonable efforts to protect such person from lynching; or (3) who, in violation of his duty as such officer or employee, shall willfully fail or refuse to make all reasonable efforts to apprehend, keep in custody, or prosecute any person who violates section 9, section 10, or this section, shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 5 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"DUTY OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

"SEC. 12. Whenever a lynching of any person shall occur, and information on oath is submitted to the Attorney General of the United States that any officer or employee of the United States or of a State or any governmental subdivision thereof who shall have been charged with the duty or shall have possessed the authority as such officer or employee to protect such person from lynching, or who, under authority or duty granted or imposed by the law of the United States or of such State, respectively, shall have had custody of the person lynched, has willfully failed or refused to make all reasonable efforts to protect such person from lynching or that any officer or employee of the United States, in violation of his duty as such officer or employee, has willfully failed or refused to make all reasonable efforts to apprehend, keep in custody, or prosecute any person who has violated section 9, section 10, or section 11 of this act, the Attorney General of the United States shall cause an investigation to be made to determine whether there has been any violation of sections 7–18 of this act. The duty imposed by this section shall be in addition to all other duties of the Attorney General.

"CIVIL ACTIONS BY INDIVIDUALS LYNCHED

"SEC. 13. (a) Any individual who is lynched, as defined in section 8 of this act, and who suffers injury to his person or damage to his property as a result of the lynching, or the next of kin of any such individual if such injury results in death, shall be entitled to maintain a civil action for damages for such injury, damage, or death against any person violating section 9, section 10, or section 11 of this act with respect to such lynching: Provided, That the satisfaction of judgment against one person who may be liable shall bar further proceedings under this section, by the individual who has obtained satisfaction of his judgment, against any other person who may also be liable.

"(b) Actions provided by this section shall be brought in the United States district court for the judicial district of which the defendant is a resident. Any such action may be brought and prosecuted by the Attorney General of the United States or his authorized representative in the name of the United States for the use of the real party in interest, or, if the claimant shall so elect, by counsel employed by the claimant, but in any event without prepayment of costs. If the amount of any such judgment shall not be paid upon demand, payment thereof may be enforced by any process, and to the extent, available under the State law for the enforcement of any other money judgment against the defendant. The cause of action accruing hereunder to a person injured by lynching shall not abate with the subsequent death of that person before final judgment but shall survive to his next of kin. For the purpose of this section the next of kin of a deceased victim of lynching shall be determined according to the laws of intestate distribution of the State of domicile of the decedent. Any judgment under this section shall be exempt from all claims of creditors.

"PLACE OF HOLDING TRIALS

"SEC. 14. (a) Any judge of the United States district court for the judicial district wherein any civil action is instituted under the provisions of section 13 of this act may by order direct that such action be tried in any place in such district as he may designate in such order.

"(b) Any judge of the United States district court for the judicial district wherein any criminal action is instituted under the provisions of section 9, section 10, or section 11 of this act may by order direct that such action be tried in any place in such district as he may designate in such order: Provided, That where possible no such criminal action shall be tried within the territorial limits of any city or county within which the lynching, which is a basis for such action, occurred.

"APPLICATION OF KIDNAPING LAW TO LYNCHING

"SEC. 15. The crime defined in and punishable under the act of June 22, 1932 (47 Stat. 326), as amended, shall include the transportation in interstate or foreign commerce of a person who is unlawfully abducted with intent to lynch or to aid in lynching such person and who is subsequently lynched or held for purposes of lynching.

"APPLICABILITY TO OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES OF THE TERRITORIES AND POSSESSIONS AND OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

"SEC. 16. The term 'officer or employee of the United States' as used in this act includes an officer or employee of any Territory or possession of the United States, or of the District of Columbia.

"SEPARABILITY CLAUSE

"SEC. 17. If any particular provision, sentence, or clause of sections 7–18 of this act, or the application thereof to any particular person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of said sections, and the application of such provision, sentence, or clause to other persons or other circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

"SHORT TITLE

"SEC. 18. Sections 7–18 of this act may be cited as the 'Federal Antilynching Act'."

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask that the amendments be printed and lie on the table as amendments to House bill 2023, not as amendments to the Gillette-Wiley amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I now send to the desk, and ask to have printed and lie on the table, an amendment known as the FEPC amendment. I offer it as an amendment to House bill 2023, not as an amendment to the Wiley-Gillette amendment in the nature of a substitute.

I ask that the amendment be read by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. LANGER to the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes, viz:

On page 4, line 19, after the word "of" insert "the foregoing provisions of."

On page 5, line 3, strike out the word "This" and insert in lieu thereof "The foregoing provisions of this."

On page 5, after line 6, add the following new sections:

"SHORT TITLE

"SEC. 7. Sections 7 to 21, inclusive, of this act may be cited as the "National Act Against Discrimination in Employment."

"FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

"SEC. 8. (a) The Congress hereby finds that the practice of discriminating in employment against properly qualified persons because of their race, religion, color, national origin, or ancestry is contrary to the American principles of liberty and of equality of opportunity, is incompatible with the Constitution, forces large segments of our population into substandard conditions of living, foments industrial strife and domestic unrest, deprives the United States of the fullest utilization of its capacities for production, endangers the national security and the general welfare, and adversely affects the domestic and foreign commerce of the United States.

"(b) The right to employment without discrimination because of race, religion, color, national origin, or ancestry is hereby recognized as and declared to be a civil right of all the people of the United States.

"(c) This act has also been enacted as a step toward fulfillment of the international treaty obligations imposed by the Charter of the United Nations upon the United States as a signatory thereof to promote 'universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.'

"(d) It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to protect the right recognized and declared in subdivision (b) hereof and to eliminate all such discrimination to the fullest extent permitted by the Constitution. This act shall be construed to effectuate such policy.

"DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 9. As used in sections 7 to 21, inclusive, of this act—

"(a) The term 'person' includes one or more individuals, partnerships, associations, corporations, legal representatives, trustees, trustees in bankruptcy, receivers, or any organized group of persons and any agency or instrumentality of the United States or of any Territory or possession thereof.

"(b) The term 'employer' means a person engaged in commerce or in operations affecting commerce having in his employ 50 or more individuals; any agency or instrumentality of the United States or of any Territory or possession thereof; and any person acting in the interest of an employer, directly or indirectly.

"(c) The term 'labor organization' means any organization, having 50 or more members employed by any employer or employers, which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of collective bargaining or of dealing with employers concerning grievances, terms, or conditions of employment, or for other mutual aid or protection in connection with employment.

"(d) The term 'commerce' means trade, traffic, commerce, transportation, or communication among the several States; or between any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia and any place outside thereof; or within the District of Columbia or any Territory; or between points in the same State but through any point outside thereof.

"(e) The term 'affecting commerce' means in commerce, or burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce.

"(f) The term 'Commission' means the National Commission Against Discrimination in Employment, created by section 12 hereof.

"(g) The term 'act' as used in sections 7 to 21, inclusive, means the National Act Against Discrimination in Employment.

"EXEMPTIONS

"SEC. 10. This act shall not apply to any State or municipality or political subdivision thereof, or to any religious, charitable, fraternal, social, educational, or sectarian corporation or association, not organized for private profit, other than labor organizations.

"UNLAWFUL EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES DEFINED

"SEC. 11. (a) It shall be an unlawful employment practice for an employer—

"(1) to refuse to hire, to discharge, or otherwise to discriminate against any individual with respect to his terms, conditions, or privileges of employment, because of such individual's race, religion, color, national origin, or ancestry;

"(2) to utilize in the hiring or recruitment of individuals for employment any employment agency, placement service, training school or center, labor organization, or any other source which discriminates against such individuals because of their race, religion, color, national origin, or ancestry.

"(b) It shall be an unlawful employment practice for any labor organization to discriminate against any individual or to limit, segregate, or classify its membership in any way which would deprive or tend to deprive such individual of employment opportunities, or would limit his employment opportunities or otherwise adversely affect his status as an employee or as an applicant for employment, or would affect adversely his wages, hours, or employment conditions, because of such individual's race, religion, color, national origin, or ancestry.

"(c) It shall be unlawful employment practice for any employer or labor organization to discharge, expel, or otherwise discriminate against any person, because he has opposed any unlawful employment practice or has filed a charge, testified, participated, or assisted in any proceedings under this act.

"THE NATIONAL COMMISSION AGAINST DISCRIMINATION IN EMPLOYMENT

"SEC. 12. (a) There is hereby created a commission to be known as the National Commission Against Discrimination in Employment, which shall be composed of seven members who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. One of the original members shall be appointed for a term of 1 year, one for a term of 2 years, one for a term of 3 years, one for a term of 4 years, one for a term of 5 years, one for a term of 6 years, and one for a term of 7 years, but their successors shall be appointed for terms of seven years each, except that any individual chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member whom he shall succeed. The President shall designate one member to serve as Chairman of the Commission. Any member of the Commission my be removed by the President upon notice and hearing for neglect of duty or malfeasance in office, but for no other cause.

"(b) A vacancy in the Commission shall not impair the right of the remaining members to exercise all the powers of the Commission and three members thereof shall constitute a quorum.

"(c) The Commission shall have an official seal which shall be judicially noticed.

"(d) The Commission shall at the close of each fiscal year report to the Congress and to the President concerning the cases it has heard; the decisions it has rendered; the names, salaries, and duties of all individuals in its employ and the moneys it has disbursed; and shall make such further reports on the cause of and means of eliminating discrimination and such recommendations for further legislation as may appear desirable.

"(e) Each member of the Commission shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year.

"(f) The principal office of the Commission shall be in the District of Columbia, but it may meet or exercise any or all of its powers at any other place and may establish such regional offices as it deems necessary. The Commission may, by one or more of its members or by such agents as it may designate, conduct any investigation, proceeding, or hearing necessary to its functions in any part of the United States. Any such agent designated to conduct a proceeding or a hearing shall be a resident of the Federal judicial circuit, as defined in sections 116 and 308 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C. Annotated, title 28, secs. 211 and 450), within which the alleged unlawful employment practice occurred.

"(g) The Commission shall have power—

"(1) to appoint such agents and employees as it deems necessary to assist it in the performance of its functions;

"(2) to cooperate with regional, State, local, and other agencies;

"(3) to pay to witnesses whose depositions are taken or who are summoned before the Commission or any of its agents the same witness and mileage fees as are paid to witnesses in the courts of the United States;

"(4) to furnish to persons subject to this act such technical assistance as they may request to further their compliance with this act or any order issued thereunder;

"(5) upon the request of any employer, whose employees or some of them refuse or threaten to refuse to cooperate in effectuating the provisions of this act, to assist in such effectuation by conciliation or other remedial action;

"(6) to make such technical studies as are appropriate to effectuate the purposes and policies of this act and to make the results of such studies available to interested governmental and nongovernmental agencies: and

"(7) to create such local, State, or regional advisory and conciliation councils as in its judgment will aid in effectuating the purpose of this act, and the Commission may empower them to study the problem or specific instances of discrimination in employment because of race, religion, color, national origin, or ancestry and to foster through community effort or otherwise good will, cooperation, and conciliation among the groups and elements of the population, and make recommendations to the Commission for the development of policies and procedures in general and in specific instances. Such advisory and conciliation councils shall be composed of representative citizens residents of the area for which they are appointed, serving without pay, but with reimbursement for actual and necessary traveling expenses; and the Commission may make provision for technical and clerical assistance to such councils and for the expenses of such assistance.

"PREVENTION OF UNLAWFUL EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES

"SEC. 13. (a) Whenever a sworn written charge has been filed by or on behalf of any person claiming to be aggrieved, or a written charge has been filed by a member of the Commission, that any person subject to the act has engaged in any unlawful employment practice, the Commission shall investigate such charge and if it shall determine after such preliminary investigation that probable cause exists for crediting such written charge, it shall endeavor to eliminate any unlawful employment practice by informal methods of conference, conciliation, and persuasion. Nothing said or done during such endeavors may be used as evidence in any subsequent proceeding.

"(b) If the Commission fails to effect the elimination of such unlawful employment practice and to obtain voluntary compliance with this act, or in advance thereof if circumstances so warrant, it shall cause a copy of such written charge to be served upon such person who has allegedly committed any unlawful employment practice, hereinafter called the respondent, together with a notice of hearing before the Commission, or a member thereof, or before a designated agent, at a place therein fixed, not less than 10 days after the service of such charge.

"(c) The member of the Commission who filed a charge shall not participate in a hearing thereon or in a trial thereof.

"(d) At the conclusion of a hearing before a member or designated agent of the Commission the entire record thereof shall be transferred to the Commission, which shall designate three of its qualified members to sit as the Commission and to hear on such record the parties at a time and place to be specified upon reasonable notice.

"(e) All testimony shall be taken under oath.

"(f) The respondent shall have the right to file a verified answer to such written charge and to appear at such hearing in person or otherwise, with or without counsel, to present evidence and to examine and cross-examine witnesses.

"(g) The Commission or the member or designated agent conducting such hearing shall have the power reasonably and fairly to amend any written charge, and the respondent shall have like power to amend its answer.

"(h) Any written charge filed pursuant to this section must be filed within 1 year after the commission of the alleged unlawful employment practice.

"(i) If upon the record, including all the testimony taken, the Commission shall find that any person named in the written charge has engaged in any unlawful employment practice, the Commission shall state its findings of fact and shall issue and cause to be served on such person an order requiring him to cease and desist from such unlawful employment practice and to take such affirmative action, including reinstatement or hiring of employees, with or without back pay, as will effectuate the policies of the act. If upon the record, including all the testimony taken, the Commission shall find that no person named in the written charge has engaged or is engaging in any unlawful employment practice, the Commission shall state its findings of fact and shall issue an order dismissing the said complaint.

"(j) Until a transcript of the record in a case shall have been filed in a court, as hereinafter provided, the Commission may at any time, upon reasonable notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper, modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any finding or order made or issued by it.

"(k) The proceedings held pursuant to this section shall be conducted in conformity with the standards and limitations of sections 5, 6, 7, and 8 of the Administrative Procedure Act, Public Law 404, Seventy-ninth Congress, June 11, 1946.

"JUDICIAL REVIEW

"SEC. 14. (a) The Commission shall have power to petition any circuit court of appeals of the United States (including the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia) or, if the circuit court of appeals to which application might be made is in vacation, any district court of the United States (including the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia) within any circuit wherein the unlawful employment practice in question occurred, or wherein the respondent transacts business, for the enforcement of such order and for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order, and shall certify and file in the court to which petition is made a transcript of the entire record in the proceedings, including the pleadings and testimony upon which such order was entered and the findings and the order of the Commission. Upon such filing, the court shall conduct further proceedings in conformity with the standards, procedures, and limitations established by section 10c and 10e of the Administrative Procedure Act.

"(b) Upon such filing, the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon such respondent and thereupon shall have jurisdiction of the proceeding and of the question determined therein and shall have power to grant such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper and to make and enter upon the pleadings, testimony, and proceedings set forth in such transcript a decree enforcing, modifying, and enforcing as so modified, or setting aside in whole or in part the order of the Commission.

"(c) No objection that has not been urged before the Commission, its member, or agent shall be considered by the court, unless the failure or neglect to urge such objection shall be excused because of extraordinary circumstances.

"(d) If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the hearing before the Commission, its member, or agent, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the Commission, its member, or agent and to be made a part of the transcript.

"(e) The Commission may modify its findings as to the facts, or make new findings, by reason of additional evidence so taken and filed, and it shall file such modified or new findings and its recommendations, if any, for the modification or setting aside of its original order.

"(f) The jurisdiction of the court shall be exclusive and its judgment and decree shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the appropriate circuit court of appeals, if application was made to the district court as hereinafter provided, and by the Supreme Court of the United States upon writ of certiorari or certification as provided in sections 239 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C., title 28, secs. 346 and 347).

"(g) Any person aggrieved by a final order of the Commission may obtain a review of such order in any circuit court of appeals of the United States in the circuit wherein the unlawful employment practice in question was alleged to have been engaged in or wherein such person transacts business, by filing in such court a written petition praying that the order of the Commission be modified or set aside. A copy of such petition shall be forthwith served upon the Commission and thereupon the aggrieved party shall file in the court a transcript of the entire record in the proceeding certified by the Commission, including the pleadings and testimony upon which the order complained of was entered and the findings and order of the Commission. Upon such filing, the court shall proceed in the same manner as in the case of an application by the Commission under subsection (a), and shall have the same exclusive jurisdiction to grant to the petitioner or the Commission such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper, and in like manner to make and enter a decree enforcing, modifying, and enforcing as so modified, or setting aside in whole or in part the order of the Commission.

"(h) Upon such filing by a person aggrieved the reviewing court shall conduct further proceedings in conformity with the standards, procedures, and limitations established by sections 10a and 10b of the Administrative Procedure Act.

"(i) The commencement of proceedings under subsection (a) or (g) of this section shall not, unless specifically ordered by the court, operate as a stay of the Commission's order.

"INVESTIGATORY POWERS

"SEC. 15. (a) For the purpose of all investigations, proceedings, or hearings which the Commission deems necessary or proper for the exercise of the powers vested in it by this act, the Commission, or any member thereof, shall have power to issue subpenas requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of any evidence relating to any investigation, proceeding, or hearing before the Commission, its member, or agent conducting such investigation, proceeding, or hearing.

"(b) Any member of the Commission, or any agent designated by the Commission for such purposes, may administer oaths, examine witnesses, and receive evidence.

"(c) Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such evidence may be required, from any place in the United States or any Territory or possession thereof, at any designated place of hearing.

"(d) In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpena issued to any person under this act, any district court of the United States, or the United States courts of any Territory or possession, or the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, within the jurisdiction of which the investigation, proceeding, or hearing is carried on or within the jurisdiction of which said person guilty of contumacy or refusal to obey is found or resides or transacts business, upon application by the Commission shall have jurisdiction to issue to such person an order requiring him to appear before the Commission, its member, or agent, there to produce evidence it so ordered, or there to give testimony relating to the investigation, proceeding, or hearing.

"(e) No person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing documentary or other evidence in obedience to the subpena of the Commission, on the ground that the testimony or evidence required of him may tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; but no individual shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he is compelled, after having claimed his privilege against self-incrimination, to testify or produce evidence, except that such individual so testifying shall not be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying. The immunity herein provided shall extend only to natural persons so compelled to testify.

"ENFORCEMENT OF ORDERS DIRECTED TO GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

"SEC. 16. The provisions of section 14 shall not apply with respect to an order of the Commission under section 13 directed to any agency or instrumentality of the United States, or of any Territory or possession thereof, or any officer or employee thereof. The Commission may request the President to take such action as he deems appropriate to obtain compliance with such orders. The President shall have power to provide for the establishment of rules and regulations to prevent the committing or continuing of any unlawful employment practice as herein defined by any person who makes a contract with any agency or instrumentality of the United States (excluding any State or political subdivision thereof) or of any Territory or possession of the United States, which contract requires the employment of at least 50 individuals. Such rules and regulations shall be enforced by the Commission according to the procedure hereinbefore provided.

"NOTICES TO BE POSTED

"SEC. 17. (a) Every employer and labor organization shall post and keep posted in conspicuous places upon its premises a notice to be prepared or approved by the Commission setting forth excerpts of the act and such other relevant information which the Commission deems appropriate to effectuate the purposes of the act.

"(b) A willful violation of this section shall be punishable by a fine of not less than $100 or more than $500 for each separate offense.

"VETERANS' PREFERENCE

"SEC. 18. Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to repeal or modify any Federal or State law creating special rights or preferences for veterans.

"RULES AND REGULATIONS

"SEC. 19. (a) The Commission shall have authority from time to time to issue, amend, or rescind suitable regulations to carry out the provisions of this act. If at any time after the issuance of any such regulation or any amendment or rescission thereof, there is passed a concurrent resolution of the two Houses of the Congress stating in substance that the Congress disapproves such regulation, amendment, or recission, such disapproved regulation, amendment, or rescission shall not be effective after the date of the passage of such concurrent resolution nor shall any regulation or amendment having the same effect as that concerning which the concurrent resolution was passed be issued thereafter by the Commission.

"(b) Regulations issued under this section shall be in conformity with the standards and limitations of the Administrative Procedure Act.

"FORCIBLY RESISTING THE COMMISSION OR ITS REPRESENTATIVES

"SEC. 20. Whoever shall forcibly resist, oppose, impede, intimidate, or interfere with a member, agent, or employee of the Commission while engaged in the performance of duties under this act, or because of such performance, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or by both.

"SEPARABILITY CLAUSE

"SEC. 21. If any provision of this act or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance shall be held invalid, the remainder of this act or the application of such provision to persons or circumstances other than those to which it is held invalid shall not be affected thereby."

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President——

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. I should like to inquire how long the Senator will speak this afternoon. I make the request because I have a short speech to follow his, and I have an engagement at 4:30 this afternoon.

Mr. LANGER. I had intended to speak until 5 o'clock, but I shall be glad to yield to the Senator if I may have unanimous consent that his speech may appear at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can yield only for a question.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Chair has ruled that the Senator can yield only for a question.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I wish to continue with the letter which I received from the dairy commissioner of North Dakota. Because of the fact that I have introduced these bills, I shall reread the first paragraph:

STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA,
Bismarck, N. Dak., January 6, 1950.

Hon. WILLIAM LANGER,
The Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am again asking for your help in behalf of the dairy farmers of North Dakota. The oleomargarine bill is before the Senate for debate, but I would first like to express the appreciation of the dairy farmers of North Dakota for the assistance you have given us during previous sessions of Congress on this controversial issue.

If the oleomargarine bill is passed as is recommended by the Senate committee with all restrictions removed as to licenses and taxes on the colored product without any safeguards set up to protect the consumers against the fraudulent sale of oleomargarine, colored and sold as butter, and to protect our entire national dairy industry; it will certainly mean a necessary curtailment in dairy farming.

North Dakota, as one of the major butter-producing States, is vitally interested in this issue; and when, in trying to promote the expansion of dairying in our State, we are met with the question by our dairy farmers as to what will happen to our butter industry if we are forced to meet competition with the unrestricted sale of oleomargarine colored to resemble butter.

As you probably know, all of the major dairy organizations in the Nation are in favor of a repeal of all licenses and taxes on margarines providing that safeguards are put into the bill making it illegal to color the product to resemble butter.

Mr. President, I call the next paragraph particularly to the attention of the Senator from Arkansas. I am sorry he is not on the floor at the moment. I call his attention to this paragraph in the letter from the dairy commissioner of my State:

One of the largest manufacturers of oleomargarine, Lever Bros., as a plaintiff in a court case against one of their competitors, won a decision, which in effect stated that no other soap company could make a bar of soap colored red to resemble their Lifebuoy soap.

In a recent court case brought by the Food and Drug Administration, against a soft-drink manufacturer, the court ruled that synthetic orange color and flavor could not be added to a soft drink, as such addition would, in effect, make the soft drink appear to be a more valuable product than it really was.

I remember very well that only a few years ago the Coca-Cola Co. brought an action against the company making Pepsi Cola, to prevent even what might be called a similarity in name, and got a decision saying that only the Coca-Cola Co. could use the word "coke," because of the fact that it had been used for a considerable period of time by them in advertising.

So here we find the Lever Bros. bringing an action against a competitor to keep them from coloring their soap red, because they have Lifebuoy soap, which they own, and which they distribute, and which is red in color. They get a decision from the court in order to keep a competitor from coloring his soap red.

I repeat, that was Lever Bros., an organization which apparently figures it is far above the law now, because in spite of the fact that an action was brought by the Attorney General under the Democratic administration, we find the Democratic National Committee, which is in charge of the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners, picking the president of Lever Bros., the greatest monopoly in the world, as general manager for the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners all over the United States of America. Of course, it may be that they are also going to have Jackson Day dinners in the 68 countries I named a little while ago, where the Lever Bros. and their subsidiaries are operating.

The letter from the dairy commissioner of North Dakota continues:

Through the years that we have had this controversial issue before Congress, we believe that it has been pretty well established that the only reason the oleomargarine people have for using the yellow coloring of butter, is to make it as nearly like butter as possible in order to fool the public.

In order to fool the public. That is what this bill is here for, in order to fool the public by permitting oleo to be colored yellow.

The letter continues:

Some oleo manufacturers are at the present time using dairy terms on their cartons, such as grade A or grade AA, which terms are used by the Federal Government in establishing grades on butter.

Speaking for the dairy farmer living in North Dakota, I would like to state that we would appreciate very much, anything you can do to prevent the wrecking of our North Dakota butter industry.

Thanking you again for your past efforts and assuring you that all of our farmers will appreciate anything you can do for them, I am,

Sincerely yours,
WILLIAM J. MURPHY,
Dairy Commissioner.

So again, Mr. President, I come back to the fact that Lever Bros., headed by its president, Charles Luckman, are really in charge of the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners of the Democratic Party which are to take place in a very few days. Here is this man lending all his influence and giving all his time and all his ingenuity and devoting, I suppose, all the resources of Lever Bros. in the way of advertising—they spent $50,000,000 in advertising, according to Fortune magazine, as I read it—to this new activity. He is the head of this gigantic corporation, this octopus, this greatest monopoly of all, this monopoly which has directorates not only in the United States, but in Belgium, in the Netherlands, in the Scandinavian countries, in Finland, in the Netherlands East Indies, in Italy, in Switzerland, in Austria, in Germany, in Czechoslovakia, in Poland, in Hungary, in Yugoslavia, in Rumania, in France, in Denmark, in Norway, in the Belgian Congo, in Siam, in China, in the Philippine Republic, in the Argentine, and in Brazil. In the United States, of course, Charles Luckman, the president, is the man chosen by the Democrats to make an outstanding success of these Jackson Day dinners, where I suppose, they are going to charge $100 a ticket. By that I mean that each ticket will cost $100. It will not cover a couple. There were 2,500 persons present at a dinner a few days ago in New York City, and I looked at it on the television. There were more millionaires at that New York dinner, Mr. President—and it was addressed by the Vice President of these great United States—there were more millionaires gathered there than I ever saw before at any dinner anywhere in the entire United States.

Yet, Mr. President, the Democrats tell us they represent the poor people, they represent the underprivileged people—so they say.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I want to congratulate the Senator for admitting that he watched the Democratic dinner on the television. I thought that he would disdain any such performance, would not even look at it, but now that he has confessed to watching that dinner from beginning to end, I want to compliment him. I think it is a compliment to the Democratic Party that my great and good liberal friend from North Dakota would do that.

Mr. LANGER. I wish to thank my distinguished friend for bringing this to my attention, and I assure him that I was getting an education. I do not belong to the regular Republican Party. I am a party within myself, known as the Farmer-Labor-Republican Party. The Farmer-Labor-Republican Party operates chiefly in the State of North Dakota, and I have been wondering how we could finance the Farmer-Labor-Republican Party in North Dakota.

As I watched and saw what was taking place in New York, I went home to North Dakota and there I arranged for similar Lincoln Day dinners. On the 9th day of February we are to have one in New Rockford, N. Dak., and charge $100 for a couple. We could not quite get $100 apiece, so we made it $100 a couple. From there we are going to Bismarck, N. Dak., and have another dinner. From Bismarck we are going to Dickinson, N. Dak. They are all advertised. From Dickinson we are going to Williston, N. Dak., and from Williston we are going to Minot, N. Dak., and from Minot we are going to Grand Forks, N. Dak. From Grand Forks, N. Dak., we go to Fargo, N. Dak., and finish on the evening of the 17th day of February. I sincerely hope that the distinguished majority leader, if he cares to attend a great, liberal gathering like that, will at least buy a ticket so that he may show his good will toward the Farmer-Labor-Republican Party of the State of North Dakota.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I wish to congratulate the Senator again upon what he says he is going to do with respect to Lincoln Day dinners in North Dakota. In other words, the great liberal from North Dakota, having taken a lesson from what happened in New York City, is doing just the opposite of what the Republicans said not long ago they would do in Washington, have the participants take box lunches to their banquet. The Senator is going to charge $50 apiece.

Mr. LANGER. No, $100 a ticket.

Mr. LUCAS. A hundred dollars a ticket.

Mr. LANGER. Yes. We do not sell any halves.

Mr. LUCAS. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. LANGER. A hundred dollars for two.

Mr. LUCAS. Yes, a hundred dollars for two.

Mr. LANGER. And a man may bring his wife or his sweetheart.

Mr. LUCAS. It costs a hundred dollars to get into any one of these banquets, does it?

Mr. LANGER. Yes. We learned that from the Democrats.

Mr. LUCAS. I am sure you have.

Mr. LANGER. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. I think the Senator from North Dakota has learned a good deal from the Democrats since he has been in the Senate, and I congratulate him on the number of votes he has cast with the Democratic Party since he has been in the Senate. He is learning fast, and it will not be long before he will be with the Democratic Party, the way he is going now, because if he follows the trail of those banquets he is surely going to be with them, and the chances are that Mr. Luckman will probably give the Senator a contribution for the Senator's next campaign before he gets through.

Mr. LANGER. I want to say to my distinguished friend that that may happen. I may be invited to join the other party. I gather, from what I have read in the newspapers, that some Republicans propose to drop certain of us who are progressives. The junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER] in an interview stated that some members of his party wanted a new party to be formed, to be made up by an amalgamation of certain Republicans and of certain Democrats, but he said he did not want in the new party Republicans who do not vote with the Republicans all the time upon the floor of the Senate. I rather gained the impression that he referred to three or four Republican Senators who have not been consistently voting the Republican—I would not say orders—but who have not voted with the Republican majority on this side of the Chamber.

So far as I am concerned, I want to make it plain that the people of North Dakota do not care whether I am here as Democrat or Republican. It does not make one bit of difference to them. I may say that after I received the Republican nomination for United States Senator the first time, the Republican National Committee donated money to my opponent in the primary.

Mr. President, I owe the Republican Party in North Dakota absolutely nothing. Not only that, but the Republican nominee for President refused to travel on the same train with me. He had my opponent in the primary on the train with him and introduced him to the people of North Dakota.

Eight years ago Mr. Dewey was candidate for President, after I had become the Republican nominee for Senator. In the Republican primary 8 years ago the Republican Governor of North Dakota called all the Republican bankers and "hifalutin" fellows together and they nominated a man against me on the independent ticket, and ran him as an independent Republican. They very proudly announced that so far as they were concerned they would as lief have a Democrat come to Washington as the present Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. In a moment. I want to say that despite all they could do, I carried every single one of the 53 counties of North Dakota. So the people of North Dakota do not care very much about the label of any man.

I now yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. I sympathize with the Senator, and I can well understand his feelings against the regular Republicans as the result of what they tried to do to him in North Dakota. I do not blame him for taking the position he does, and making the kind of speeches he does on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. LANGER. I thank the Senator from Illinois, and I am sure he would feel pretty much as I do if he were in my place.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. Now that my good friend the majority leader has had occasion to sort of get the distinguished Senator from North Dakota away from this Luckman tale, I ask him, is there any Republican angle to the Luckman tale, or is it 100 percent Democratic?

Mr. LANGER. So far as I am concerned it is 100 percent Democratic.

Mr. WILEY. We have all heard what the distinguished majority leader has just said. I thought it was a confession, and not avoidance when he said he hoped the distinguished Senator from North Dakota might also receive a contribution from Mr. Luckman.

Mr. LANGER. I do not know Mr. Luckman. I do not know whether he contributes to Republicans or Democrats or to whom he contributes. I said I did not know anything about that.

Mr. WILEY. Has the Senator any thought as to what will be done by Mr. Luckman now that he is the chairman of the Jackson-Jefferson Day dinners, and now that the Democrats are leading the fight to get rid of the oleo tax and want to open up the whole spread field even in those States where it is not permissible by State law for the oleo interests to take over that field? Has the distinguished Senator any idea as to why Mr. Luckman is in the picture in this way?

Mr. LANGER. As I said in the beginning, Mr. Luckman's company is operating in many different countries. I do not know whether it is proposed to hold Jackson-Jefferson Day dinners in Belgium, the Netherlands, Scandinavia, Finland, the East Indies, India, Switzerland, and other countries. Mr. Luckman, as I said, has a wonderful organization, the finest in the world. I do not know anything about Mr. Luckman. I do not know the man. I do not want any of his contributions. I do not need them. I get along very nicely in North Dakota without them. Whether or not he contributes to the Democratic Party I do not know. I know he was appointed by the President to become the head of a department for a certain time, and he antagonized every farmer in my State when he said they could not eat chickens on certain days of the week. Mr. Luckman is the man who established chickenless days.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I, too, was against the order which was issued with regard to not eating chicken on certain days, I will say to my friend.

Mr. LANGER. I am delighted to know that the Senator was opposed to that order.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not want the RECORD to remain in the shape the Senator from Wisconsin has now made it. What I said a moment ago was that, in view of the fact that the Senator from North Dakota is a great liberal and in view of the fact that Mr. Luckman is a great liberal, Mr. Luckman might at some time make a contribution to the Senator's campaign. When someone wishes to make an honest contribution to the campaign of a person running for office—including the Senator from Wisconsin and other Senators—I have not known any candidate who would not accept such a contribution. Mr. Luckman is making a contribution to the Democratic Party by being chairman of the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners. He is making a tremendous contribution by permitting the use of his name and giving of his talents, and so forth, to make the dinners a success. I consider that to be a real contribution.

Mr. LANGER. I may say to the distinguished Senator from Illinois that I question the propriety of choosing as general manager of the Jackson-Jefferson Day dinners a man whose company is being sued at the present time in the Federal courts by the Attorney General on the ground that it is a monopoly.

Mr. LUCAS. I appreciate the Senator's reaction in that respect and the position he takes, and I shall not argue the question with him at this time. The Senator is entitled to his own views, and he usually has them, and expresses them on the floor very forcefully.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, in my opinion, there has never been a more far-reaching bill before the Senate, so far as our domestic economy is concerned, than the oleo bill authored by my distinguished colleague from Arkansas. In fact, Mr. President, I think the bill represents one of the most diabolical schemes that has even been proposed to ruin an industry which is the largest segment of our American farm economy.

During the past few years we have witnessed the near destruction of the sheep industry. We have less sheep in the United States than we had 50 years ago. Imports of wool have been invited by the lowering of duties until we import two-thirds of the wool used in our country. While under the ECA, $600,000,000 worth of cotton has been given away, we have imported 600,000,000 pounds of wool. This does not make economic sense in any language. We subsidize exports of cotton or give it away at a time the sheep industry is being ruined. In fact, we have reduced the sheep numbers by a third the past 5 years. The sheep numbers in North Dakota were reduced by 50 percent between 1940 and 1949.

What has this administration done to the fur-farming industry? It has all but ruined this system of farming. This was done by sending a delegation to Russia asking the Russians to dump their furs on our markets. In fact, over $232,000,000 worth of furs were imported in 1 year and this was followed up by a 20-percent retail tax.

Now it appears that the next livestock industry to be ruined by this same administration is the dairy industry. Why do I make that statement? Just check up a little and see what is happening and has happened. Do Senators know we have two and one-half million less dairy cows than we had 15 years ago in the United States? Do Senators know that we have 3,000,000 less dairy cows and dairy heifers than we had 5 years ago? Before the war we had more dairy cows than beef cattle, but oleo has already replaced 3,000,000 dairy cows. Before the war 200,000,000 to 300,000,000 pounds of oleo were made in the United States. During the war the OPA froze butter at 46 cents per pound (or 30 cents per hour for labor) at a price below the cost of production. The OPA discouraged butter production. While in 1941 and 1942 we had an annual production of over 1,800,000,000 pounds of butter this annual production was reduced to 1,100,000,000 pounds by 1946. Since 1946 the annual butter production has been increasing in spite of the aid and comfort given the 25 oleo manufacturers.

While oleo annual production was 200,000,000 to 300,000,000 pounds prewar, its production was stimulated during and given special consideration and reached an annual production of over 800,000,000 pounds in 1948.

Mr. Charles Luckman, head of the Lever Brothers, the world's largest vegetable oil cartel was brought to Washington to save feed. Senators remember him. The Agricultural Department evidently could not handle the situation so they got the soap and oleo man Luckman to take over. Senators remember he had a program to prevent farmers from feeding their livestock. He must have kept the feed from the dairy cattle because butter production went down, but the joke in the situation is that oleo production went up. The Lever Bros. Co. bought the Jelke Oleo Co. incidentally, though, I suppose oleo and soap are made in much the same manner. There evidently is not much of a change from the soap business to the oleo business.

Is it not a fact that this English vegetable oil cartel is building the largest oleo plant in America in California? Will it not be a joke on our cotton oil friends if the vegetable oil cartel uses coconut oil in its oleo plants instead of cotton seed oil? If this English vegetable oil cartel monopoly can get the Fulbright bill passed what is to stop them from dropping cotton seed oil like other oleo manufacturers have dropped soybean oil from their formula, and use coconut oil, which is recognized as more nearly like butterfat than either soybean or cottonseed oil?

While we are speaking of this English cartel, I wish to say, Mr. President, that I have in my hand a clipping from a newspaper headed "Briton sees need for more United States aid." The article is dated New York, November 1—United Press—and reads as follows:

> A British financial expert said today Britain may need additional loans from the United States to replace special temporary aids now bolstering his country's economy. Sir Sydney Caine, Minister for Financial Affairs and head of the United Kingdom Treasury, hinted that a request for an increase of overseas lending will be made when funds from the Economic Cooperation Administration end in 1952.

Yet this is the same country that, as I stated a few minutes ago, has a monopoly in cocoa and is penalizing every child who buys a Hershey bar.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. In view of the observation made about the necessity for increased loans to Great Britain under the ECA program, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator whether, first, he would consider that what we have done for Britain is a loan. Is it not a fact that what we have contributed to Britain through ECA is a grant?

Mr. LANGER. It is a gift.

Mr. WHERRY. Second, what machinery, if any, has been set up by Britain and the United States to carry the ECA countries away from grants, which have been extended to the tune of more than $15,000,000,000, back to a private-enterprise system, whereby they can stand on their own feet if and when ECA aid has been completed and concluded within the next year or, let us say, 2 years, at the most?

My point is this: We have been told that not only would the 4-year program increase the productivity and stabilize the countries which are receiving the ECA grants and aid, but that if the United States would continue that program for 4 years, those countries would be able to take care of themselves. When that time arrives, will there be continued requests for more aid, or will those countries then be in such a situation that they will be able to proceed under their own steam, without any additional grants in any way, shape, or form; and will those 11 countries then be able to conduct their own business without any further aid from the United States?

Mr. LANGER. My answer simply is that I am not a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, and I have no particular knowledge of that matter, except as I obtain it from reading the newspapers. Some of the countries say they will be able to carry on. I understand that some of the countries which have been receiving aid from the United States are going to expect it to continue for at least 10 years.

I have just read some newspaper articles about statements given out by the Senator from Texas, saying that so far as he is concerned, as chairman of the committee, he proposes to cut down the amount of the aid, and not to give it unless there is some accounting and some indication that the people of the countries concerned are willing to work.

So far as I am concerned, I am willing to take the word of the distinguished chairman of the committee.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to ask one other question. The Senator from Nebraska has always been in favor, as has the distinguished Senator from North Dakota, of providing food for people who need it, and I am sure the distinguished Senator from North Dakota feels that way about that matter. Does the Senator now feel, however, that, beyond the requests for food and the other necessities of life, possibly it would be desirable, as a restriction or condition on further loans or grants to Great Britain and other ECA countries, to require that they eliminate their economic and trade barriers and establish convertibility of currencies, so that they can do business among themselves, and sometime can begin to realize that they can do so without further relief from the United States? Would the Senator from North Dakota feel that would be the correct position to take?

Mr. LANGER. Certainly. Not only that, but I feel that dismantling in Germany should be stopped. This morning I received a letter from John B. Crane, of 886 National Press Building, Washington, D. C., relative to the dismantling of the Hochfrequenz-Tiegelstahl Works, a small but highly important steel plant at Bochum. At this moment Britain is dismantling that plant and is putting hundreds and hundreds of Germans out of work.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter and reports I have received from Mr. Crane be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and accompanying reports were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 5, 1950.

The Honorable WILLIAM LANGER,
United States Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR LANGER: Knowing of your keen interest and previous constructive efforts in stopping the dismantling of German factories, I thought you would be interested in some of my recent observations on a short vacation trip to western Germany.

I found dismantling still going on, and one small but highly important steel plant at Bochum, known as the Hochfrequenz-Tiegelstahl works, is scheduled to be completely destroyed by January 31.

The facts in the enclosed reports tell the story in detail. It would appear that the British insistence on continuing the dismantling of this plant is based either on ignorance of the facts, or a deliberate desire to get rid of German competition. Most American experts believe the latter is the reason.

Prompt action could still save this plant. The facts presented here are for your information and to be used as you think appropriate. The State Department could probably secure a moratorium on further dismantling, if they so desired.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN B. CRANE.

DISMANTLING OF HOCHFREQUENZ-TIEGELSTAHL PLANT BASED ON ERRONEOUS DATA—SHOULD BE STOPPED IMMEDIATELY

A grave injustice will be done to the workers and management of the small steel plant at Bochum in the Ruhr, known as the Hochfrequenz-Tiegelstahl Werke, if further dismantling of the plant is continued. The plant is only 35 percent dismantled and can yet be saved if prompt action is taken.

None of the arguments advanced officially and unofficially by the British to justify their continued dismantling of the plant will stand up under close examination. Various American experts, including the Keenan mission, the Humphrey committee, and the staff of Commissioner John J. McCloy, have carefully studied the Hochfrequenz plant at Bochum and all have concluded the plant should not be dismantled. Then why do the British insist on further dismantling?

BRITISH ARGUMENTS TO DEFEND DISMANTLING BASED ON ERRONEOUS DATA

None of the four major arguments advanced by the British to justify destruction of the Hochfrequenz plant can be successfully defended if an investigation is held and an opportunity is permitted in open hearings to refute them. Here are the four arguments:

Argument 1: The Hochfrequenz plant, it is alleged, is already 80 percent dismantled, and it is too late to save it or remove it from the list of plants to be dismantled.

Answer: When this statement was made by the British early in December 1949 an American expert immediately visited the Ruhr and inspected the Hochfrequenz plant. He found it only 35 percent dismantled and the plant was still operating with over 600 workers. The only equipment dismantled had been war-damaged equipment, never used since the plant reopened after the war. At the present time, January 4, 1950, the plant is only about 50 percent dismantled. It can still be saved for effective production.

Argument 2: The plant is a war plant, and it is alleged that it was used during the war to produce turbine blades for jet airplanes. Security demands its destruction.

Answer: The plant is not a category I war plant since it was not built specifically for the manufacture of armament and war material. Before the war, during the war, and since the war it has produced castings and other parts essential to the German steel industry, the coal-mining industry, and the electric-power industry.

The German management categorically deny that they ever produced blades for jet aircraft, and assert this is absolutely false. They welcome a chance to disprove the British charges and will gladly open their books to any investigating committee.

Argument 3: If the Hochfrequenz plant is allowed to continue production it will bring total steel production in Germany above the 11,100,000 tons annually allowed by the Allies.

Answer: The annual steel-production capacity of the Hochfrequenz plant is only 6,000 tons. The parent plant at Krefeld has offered to reduce their steel-producing capacity by 20,000 tons annually, if the British will save the small plant at Bochum from further dismantling. If the British would accept this offer, the total steel capacity of the combined plants would be reduced by 14,000 tons, and the total steel capacity in Germany would be reduced.

The British have replied to the above German proposition for substitution that it is beyond their power to grant such a substitution and that the matter would have to be decided by the three high commissioners. The three high commissioners decided on December 19, 1949, that it was beyond their power and that it would have to be decided by the three foreign ministers in Washington, London, and Paris. An immediate moratorium on further dismantling is necessary to permit the foreign ministers to reexamine the situation of the Hochfrequenz-Tiegelstahl plant.

Argument 4: The Hochfrequenz-Tiegelstahl plant is on the east bank of the Rhine, and hence would be taken over by the Russians when world war III begins.

Answer: This argument scarcely deserves an answer. Many of the steel plants recently saved from dismantling are on the east bank of the Rhine. Present Allied policy calls for the economic reconstruction of all western Germany, not just the part west of the Rhine River.

Conclusion: Since the arguments in support of further dismantling of the Hochfrequenz plant are based on false data and inadequate evidence, an immediate stop to further dismantling of the plant should be granted, and a thorough investigation instituted.

WHY DISMANTLING OF THE HIGH-FREQUENCY STEEL PLANT AT BOCHUM, GERMANY, SHOULD BE STOPPED

The Hochfrequenz-Tiegelstahl works (a small steel plant in the Ruhr making high alloy, heat-resistant steels) at Bochum has been 35 percent dismantled as of December 21, 1949, and the completion of the dismantling is scheduled by the British for some time in January.

Any further dismantling of the plant will affect key furnaces and equipment, and will cause the shut-down of the plant with over 600 workers losing their jobs shortly after the new year begins.

EFFORTS PREVIOUSLY MADE TO STOP DISMANTLING OF THIS PLANT

The American Government made two investigations of the Hochfrequenz steel plant at Bochum in 1948. One of these was made by Mr. Keenan, and one by a group headed by Mr. Wolf who worked for the Humphrey committee (Paul Hoffman's committee). In both cases the American experts unanimously recommended that this steel plant be saved. Mr. Keenan declared that it was indispensable to the recovery and successful operation of the German coal mines. Mr. Wolf declared that the plant was essential to the efficient operation of Germany's steel industry and to the economic recovery of western Europe.

Several United States Senators have intervened with the State Department on behalf of this plant. Among those who have tried to save this plant are Senator GEORGE, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and Senator MCCARRAN, chairman of the ECA "watchdog committee." Moreover, Senators BRIDGES and WHERRY have been active in trying to save this and other steel plants.

PAST AND PRESENT DISMANTLING STATUS OF HOCHFREQUENZ-TIEGELSTAHL PLANT

During the war the Hochfrequenz steel plant was badly damaged by bombings. The British decided the plant was not a war plant and gave the plant a work permit to resume operations, and removed the plant from the reparations list in February 1947.

With the plant removed from the reparations list early in 1947 the management and workers got busy and rebuilt the plant with an expenditure of over 4,000,000 marks. Over 2 years later, on May 5, 1949, the British notified the plant that it would be dismantled beginning July 1, 1949.

As a result of the intervention of Senators GEORGE, MCCARRAN, and others, the British withdrew the dismantling order temporarily, but gave out a new order a month later. They ordered the dismantling to begin August 3, 1949. Dismantling has been in progress since that date and still continues.

In justifying their new order to dismantle the Hochfrequenz steel works the British Government told the State Department that duplicate capacity existed in other German steel plants and that the output of the small Bochum plant could easily be taken over by other steel plants. They said the workers could readily be absorbed in other industries when the plant was dismantled.

I have just returned from Germany where I took occasion to visit the Hochfrequenz plant and to talk with the management. They declare that the bulk of their production cannot be produced in any other steel plant in Germany as it requires special furnaces and highly specialized equipment not available elsewhere. The dismantlement of their plant will make them dependent on imports from the British and French alloy steel industries.

Moreover, I checked with the mayor's office in Bochum and found that the town already has over 2,500 unemployed metal workers as a result of the recent dismantling of the huge Bochumer Verein steel plant which is also located in the town of Bochum.

Hence, if the Hochfrequenz-Tiegelstahl Werke is dismantled, it will dump an additional 650 workers and their families on the local relief rolls. Since unemployment has been growing in western Germany in recent months, is it desirable deliberately to increase this unemployment by the dismantling of a nonwar steel plant?

The British admit that the Hochfrequenz steel plan is not a primary war plant, and that almost all of its production has always been for major peacetime industries such as the railway industry, the coal-mining industry, the electric utility industry, etc.

ADENAUER INTERVENES TO SAVE HOCHFREQUENZ

Dr. Adenauer, the Reichs Chancelor of the new Federal Republic of Western Germany, has just intervened to try to save the Hochfrequenz plant at Bochum. At the last meeting of the three Allied High Commissioners for Germany, held on December 16, 1949, at Petersberg near Bonn, Dr. Adenauer pleaded for the saving of the Hochfrequenz plant. The commissioners replied that since the plant was not included in the list of plants agreed upon at Paris in November, it was not within their jurisdiction to consider his request.

It should be noted that the decision to dismantle the Hochfrequenz plant was made without any reasons ever being given in defense of such action, and without the Germans ever being told why the plant was to be dismantled, or ever being permitted to refute erroneous statements which have been made about the plant.

It is the consensus of opinion of American experts who have carefully studied the Bochum situation that the major motive behind the British insistence on dismantling the Hochfrequenz plant is the desire to eliminate German competition.

Of great significance in this regard is the fact that the American High Commissioner for Germany, John J. McCloy, told me in a conference in his office at Frankfurt, Germany, on December 19, 1949, that he personally would like to see the Hochfrequenz plant saved.

AN IMMEDIATE MORATORIUM ON DISMANTLING IS NECESSARY

If the Hochfrequenz steel plant at Bochum is to be saved, an immediate moratorium on further dismantling is necessary. Such a moratorium should be for 60 or 90 days, or whatever period is required for the appointment of a special committee to investigate and report on the situation at Bochum. No harm could result from such a moratorium and investigation, while such an inquiry might well prevent a grave injustice being done.

JOHN B. CRANE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 28, 1949.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I did not know the distinguished Senator was even going to mention the subject of dismantling. I have not had a chance to see the letter to which he has referred.

I have already consulted with the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, for whom I have the deepest regard, relative to plant disposal in Germany.

Does the distinguished Senator from North Dakota have any information, other than what is contained in the letter, relative to any orders issued by any Government agencies about the sale of war plants in Germany at this time?

Mr. LANGER. Not about the sale of such plants; but I have information that the military attachés have stopped this matter in the American zone.

Mr. WHERRY. Would the Senator feel there should be an investigation or any further consideration on the part of the Senate, or any committee thereof, to find out what is the status of the dismantling program, other than what has been told us by the Secretary of State?

Mr. LANGER. I think the Senate should make its own investigation, through the appropriate and proper committee, to find out whether dismantling in the American zone by the American military authorities has stopped.

(At this point Mr. LANGER yielded to Mr. MCCARRAN, who discussed the displaced-persons program. On request of Mr. LANGER, and by unanimous consent, Mr. MCCARRAN's remarks appear in the RECORD at the conclusion of Mr. LANGER's speech.)

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, the first session of the Eighty-first Congress put oleo into the armed forces diet. Millions of pounds of oleo have been bought by armed forces. I understand the enlisted men get the oleo and the officers the butter. I notice that the House and Senate restaurants do not serve oleo.

Many of my colleagues do not realize what is behind the whole controversy. They seem to think it is just an argument between oleo and butter. That is not the case, by any means. All the dairymen ask is that oleo be sold as oleo and that it not be disguised as butter. We have had other synthetic substitute dairy products, such as filled milk where skimmed milk and vegetable oil are evaporated and sold for 2 cents a can less than evaporated natural milk.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I have not been able to hear the entire address of the distinguished Senator from North Dakota, but as I entered the Senate Chamber he was speaking about a monopoly in colored soap; was he not?

Mr. LANGER. Yes—Lifebuoy soap.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator mean there is a suit now pending, by which it is sought to prevent the sale of any other colored soap?

Mr. LANGER. Mr. Luckman, for Lever Bros., brought a suit against some of their competitors who were coloring the soap red, and he won it.

Mr. WHERRY. On that basis, it is the Senator's contention, is it not, that it is a subterfuge to color oleomargarine to imitate butter?

Mr. LANGER. Certainly.

Mr. WHERRY. Therefore, it is the holding of the Supreme Court with respect to the monopoly on soap, held by the firm in question, that leads the Senator to believe the makers of oleo have no right to color it and sell it as a substitute for butter. Is that correct?

Mr. LANGER. My friend from Nebraska is entirely correct.

Mr. President, millions upon millions of American babies are fed a formula based on the use of natural evaporated milk. Do Senators wish to have babies fed filled milk? If oleo equals butter, then filled or synthetic milk is equal to the natural product. I repeat, synthetic filled evaporated milk is the same as oleo in principle. The amounts of vegetable oils and skim milk are different. Oleo has 80 percent slowly undigestible cottonseed or other vegetable oil, and 15 percent skim milk and salt and a preservative. Filled evaporated milk has 7 percent cottonseed oil and 93 percent skim milk. I yield at this time to any Senator who will say that he has been feeding filled milk to any of his children, or that he knows of any doctor who has ever advocated the use of filled evaporated milk instead of the natural evaporated milk. I have no fear of anyone being able to answer the question.

Then we have oleo ice cream, which is an article of commerce in some States. All these substitutes depend on the dairy cow for the base of their product, which is skim milk. Oleo ice cream has already been served here in the Capitol in an effort to demonstrate its qualities. Where does this leave the dairy farmer? Must he develop a skim-milk cow to stay in the dairy business?

Then we have oleo bottled milk entering into the picture. Ask some of the committees that have been in Mexico City and Tokyo how they like oleo bottled milk. My colleagues should go slow before they take this step to ruin a $10,000,000,000 industry. Do they wish to add a few hundreds of thousands to the unemployment rolls? Do they know that 10,000,000 people have jobs in connection with the dairy industry?

When President Truman addressed Congress the other day and talked about the general welfare, I do not think he meant the general welfare of any international English vegetable-oil cartel and monopoly—or did he? I do not think he meant—at least I hope he did not mean—the general welfare of the 25 oleo corporations, who have been reaping such enormous profits from their synthetic product. I should like to think the President meant that he was interested in the general welfare of the 2,500,000 dairy farmers of our Nation. I should like to think President Truman and his party would be interested in the health of the American people, which is being jeopardized by the promotion of the use of cottonseed oil. He speaks often of a health program, and I should like to think his interest in such a program would be based on a greater use of the greatest single food ever known to man—milk—and its products.

My party nearly stubbed its toe on the oleo bill 2 years ago. We were able to give it a sleeping pill in the Senate. We did not let the millions of easy money change our course. I note that Luce's magazines received $12,000,000 for whisky and liquor advertisements last year and that they also had some very extensive oleo advertisements and pro-oleo editorials. I hope the Democrats will not fall for this one, either. They are constantly telling us about cartels and how the Republicans are in with big business. How they will vote on this oleo bill will determine how sincere they really are in trying to hold monopolies in control. In fact, I am really sorry for our distinguished majority leader, who hails from a great agriculture and dairy State. Does he want Illinois dairy prices to be like the Illinois egg prices are at this time? In my State eggs sold in December for as little as 18 or 19 cents a dozen. Every day in my mail I find letters from farmers protesting the price of eggs. Is that what the farmers can continue to expect from this administration? Do we want to follow up what we have done to the sheep business, the fur business, and the poultry business, by taking this step to ruin the dairy business?

I noted in the press that on January 3 our lovable Vice President told a group in Kentucky that "the farm situation is discouraging." I ask today, do we want to discourage another and the largest segment of the farming business by passing this most destructive legislation? We can pass it, perhaps, but we will regret the day. The day it will be found out for sure will be election day, next November, in my judgment. Mark well what I am telling the Senate today, because Senators have the votes and the responsibility. Every Senator who votes for these few big corporations will regret his vote. Democrats may say they are for the people, but for what people? If this bill is passed, I am sure it will be appropriate to get Mr. Luckman, who has already been designated as general manager of the Jackson Day dinners, to serve oleo on that occasion. Nothing could be more appropriate and more proper than to have oleo served instead of butter on this great Democratic holiday, at a time when the Democrats will be celebrating.

Mr. President, I agree with what the distinguished Vice President said about the farm situation being discouraging. During the first 9 months of last year, the farmers of North Dakota received $191,930,000 less than they received for a similar period the year before. That is a reduction of approximately 30 percent. If the farmers had not had that reduction, they would be buying more goods of all kinds, including radios and what not.

I have some figures to show the difference between the prices the farmers received a year ago and what they are now receiving, and what they paid a year ago and what they are now paying for some of the things which they buy.

On April 26, 1948, at Rock Lake, N. Dak., as reported by the administration, oats were selling for 98 cents a bushel. A year later, on April 26, 1949, the price had dropped to 51 cents a bushel.

On April 26, 1948, barley sold for $2.06 a bushel, and in 1949 it sold for 92 cents a bushel.

Flax was reduced in price from $5.66 a bushel to $3.60 a bushel.

Durum, $2.61 a bushel, to $1.94 a bushel.

Wheat from $2.10 a bushel, to $1.91 a bushel.

The protein premium on wheat was reduced from 25 cents a bushel to 4 cents a bushel.

Under this administration, what has happened to what the farmers buy?

On April 26, 1948, a farmer at Rock Lake, N. Dak., could buy a model A tractor for $1,970. Last April the price was $2,400.

A farmer could buy a model D John Deere tractor for $2,370, and last April it cost $2,750. Think of that increase in price, when the prices of most articles are going down.

In April 1948 a self-propelled combine could be bought for $4,740, and in April 1949 it cost $5,045.

In April 1948 a farmer could buy a press drill for $680. Last April it cost $800.

Mr. President, the dairy industry is one of the largest industries in the State of North Dakota, and if this bill should become law that industry will be ruined in that State. That is why I read the letter from the dairy commissioner of North Dakota, Mr. William J. Murphy. That is why the secretary of agriculture of North Dakota came to Washington to protest at the time when the oleomargarine bill was previously being considered. To the people of my State, not only the farmers but also the businessmen, it is a very serious matter when there is the tremendous reduction in farm income which I have already described.

North Dakota is known as the most progressive State in the Union, according to John Gunther. The State bank in North Dakota is owned by the people. It makes a profit of a half-million dollars a year. We have our own mills and elevators, and we manufacture many of our own foods at a profit of $865,000. Last year it was nearly half a million dollars.

We have our own insurance system, our own storm and hail insurance. We saved our farmers $100,000,000 in hail insurance. We insure every public building, every one of our schoolhouses, and our county courthouses, and it cost us, for a little while, a third of what the old-line insurance companies charged. The State writes its own fidelity bonds. Everyone handling public money in North Dakota is bonded. We have nearly $2,000,000 in that fund.

We may do as South Dakota has done—go into the cement business. South Dakota has its own cement plant, which has been a great success. We propose at an election, within a short time, to submit to the people the question of whether North Dakota shall build its own cement plant. Some years ago there was a cement plant owned by private industry, but the Cement Trust put that plant out of business because the trust could furnish the cement more cheaply than it could be produced in North Dakota. So within a short time the question will arise in North Dakota as to whether the State shall establish its own cement plant.

One industry after another has been ruined by this administration. If the pending oleomargarine bill shall become a law, according to the dairy commissioner of North Dakota, the commissioner of agriculture of North Dakota, and according to scores of letters and telegrams which the various creamery cooperative companies have poured in to Washington, the administration will also ruin the dairy industry.

I appeal to Senators not to act hastily, but to make a thorough investigation before they ruin not only the farmers of North Dakota, but the farmers of all the other States I have mentioned this afternoon.

In closing, Mr. President, I again desire to call attention to the speech made by the President of the United States in Philadelphia, when he was a candidate, when he said, "Any farmer who does not vote the Democratic ticket is guilty of ingratitude," and when he said, "Any laboring man who does not vote the Democratic ticket is guilty of ingratitude."

I read on the floor of the Senate the names of the States which took the President at his word, which voted Democratic, which gave him their electoral votes. When we add them together, we find that if those votes had not gone to President Truman, he would have been 70 electoral votes short.

I say, Mr. President, this is no way to double-cross the farmers of those States which took the President at his word, and voted for him believing he was a friend and that the Democratic Party was a friend of the dairy farmers of this great country.

ADMINISTRATION OF DISPLACED-PERSONS PROGRAM IN EUROPE

During the delivery of Mr. LANGER'S speech,

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, has the Senator from North Dakota arrived at a point in his discussion where he can permit me to make a statement for the RECORD?

Mr. LANGER. Yes; and I ask unanimous consent that whatever the distinguished Senator from Nevada wishes to say at this point may appear in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCARRAN. I wish to have the clerk read a short statement which I send to the desk.

Mr. LANGER. I yield for that purpose, provided it is understood that, by unanimous consent, I shall not lose the floor by so doing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered; and the matter sent to the desk by the Senator from Nevada will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR PAT M'CARRAN, CHAIRMAN, SENATE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

There is set forth below copy of exhibit No. 8 of the investigation regarding the administration of our displaced-persons program in Europe:

AMERICAN CONSULATE GENERAL,
Munich, Germany, September 9, 1949.

Subject: Possibility of fraud in connection with visas obtained by displaced persons in Amberg, Germany.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE, Washington.

SIR: I have the honor to report that it has come to the attention of the Amberg suboffice of the Consulate General that 10 visas were issued between December 29, 1948, and June 16, 1949, to displaced persons who are apparently ineligible under Public Law 774 for admission into the United States. It is understood that these persons are either now en route to or are already in the United States. These persons have all made statements under oath in their visa applications which subsequent documentary evidence had shown to be probably false, and in each case the eligibility of the person concerned was dependent upon the truth of the statements. The specific point in question is the date upon which these applicants arrived in Germany. In order to be eligible under Public Law 774, these applicants must have arrived in Germany before December 22, 1945. The recently discovered documentation indicates that these applicants all arrived subsequent to this date.

The matter was called to the attention of the Consulate General by the military government officer responsible for the town of Schwandorf, Bavaria, who is at present investigating charges of bribery of a member of the city government of Schwandorf by a prospective visa applicant. The accused is said to have paid 50 marks through the wife of the president of the Jewish committee of the town, in an effort to have the city records which show residence in Schwandorf adjusted so as to make him eligible under Public Law 774. This investigation has shown that a number of displaced persons who had already departed for the United States had previously caused their police records in Schwandorf to be changed, and further that upon their presentation for a visa, the statements which they made under oath did not correspond with records in Schwandorf. After examining the Schwandorf police records in these cases, the records of the International Refugee Organization in Amberg (IRO area IV headquarters) were also consulted. It was shown that these records agree with the Schwandorf records and do not support the statements made by the applicants in their application.

The 10 cases in question are as follows:

1. Boltuch, Lea, was issued Polish quota visa 3227/50 on December 29, 1948. Miss Boltuch stated under oath that she had resided in Munich from November 1945 until 1946. The Schwandorf records in this case consisted of two documents, one a questionnaire which Miss Boltuch prepared in order to obtain a German identification card. On the identification card questionnaire, she stated that she arrived directly in Schwandorf from Poland in the summer of 1946. On her police registration card, a notice as to her residence in Munich has been added, obviously subsequent to her original registration. In the files of IRO in Amberg, two documents were consulted in this case, the questionnaire prepared by Miss Boltuch for the Army which states that she arrived in Germany in July 1946 from Poland, and the IRO Card and Maintenance Questionnaire (CM–1 form) which indicates that she resided in Munich during the time stated on her application.

2 and 3. The documents in connection with Miss Boltuch's sister and brother-in-law, Simon and Taube Haber (Polish quota visas 6028/50 and 6029/50, issued February 3, 1949) also follow the same pattern of discrepancy, i. e., the residence in Munich is added later on police registration card, the identification card questionnaire shows no residence in Munich, the Army questionnaire shows arrival in Germany in 1946, and the CM–1 form shows residence in Munich between October 1945 and August 1946. It is noted that in both the Boltuch and Haber cases the CM–1 form was prepared on May 26, 1948, at which time it was generally known that in order to qualify under the President's directive of December 22, 1945, concerning the immigration of displaced persons, the applicant must have been in Germany prior to the date of the directive.

4 and 5. Brafman, Daniel and Anna, were issued Polish quota visas 3593/50 and 3594/50 on February 2, 1949. Brafman stated in his application that he came to Germany in November 1945 and resided in the neighborhood of Schwandorf from that date on. On his Schwandorf identification card questionnaire, he states that he arrived in Schwandorf in July 1946. However, there is an entry in pencil (possibly in Brafman's own handwriting) between his statements as to residence in Piotrkow, Poland, in 1945, and Lodz, Poland, in 1946, stating that he lived in Schwandorf between November and December 1945. Brafman's CM–1 form shows residence in Lodz, Poland, uninterruptedly from June 1945 until June 1946, where he was employed as a tailor.

6, 7, and 8. Henryk, Mela, and Fedor Badrian were issued German quota visa 6945, Polish quota visa 5601/53 and German quota visa 6946, respectively, on April 21, 1949. Badrian based his eligibility on arrival in Schwandorf in September 1945 from Kattowice, Poland. This statement is substantiated by the identification card questionnaire in Schwandorf. However, the IRO CM–1 form shows Badrian to have been residing uninterruptedly in Kattowice from January 1945 until September 1946, and the IRO DP registration card (DP–2 card) shows the same information.

9 and 10. Israel and Irena Dreier were issued Polish quota visas 5415/56 and 5416/56 on June 16, 1949. Dreier claims to have been in Schwandorf between September and December 1945. There is no record in the Schwandorf police records of this trip to Schwandorf from Poland. Furthermore, there is attached to the police records a Polish certificate of residence showing Dreier to be living in Krakow from March 1945 until March 1946. The CM–1 Form does not show residence for Dreier in Schwandorf before September 1946.

The investigation of these cases and other similar cases in which visas have not yet been issued is being continued by the local Displaced Persons Commission team, the International Refugee Organization, and military government, CIC, and this office, and if any other cases are discovered in which it is believed that visas have been issued to persons not eligible under Public Law 774, the Department will be informed immediately.

Information in the records in question indicates that the following persons may have made false statements in their visa applications believing that these statements were necessary in order to establish their eligibility under Public Law 774:

Albert, Solomon (Polish quota visa 5453/56 issued June 30, 1949).

Apfelbaum, Juda and Pérla (Polish quota visas 5626/53 and 5627/53, issued April 22, 1949).

Taffel, Leib and Estéra (Polish quota visas 6202/52 and 6203/52, issued March 29, 1949).

The information in the documents, however, shows that these persons were already eligible from the point of view of entry into Germany prior to December 22, 1945. These persons had been in concentration camps in Germany during the war, then returned to Poland, and apparently falsified the dates of their reentry into Germany.

The Schwandorf documents disclosed above are in the archives of the burgermeister of Schwandorf, and the IRO CM–1 forms and DP–2 cards are in possession of the IRO Area IV Headquarters, Amberg, Germany.

Respectfully yours,

SAM E. WOODS,
American Consul General.

(Copy to Supervisory Consulate General, Frankfurt.)

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, yesterday there was released from my office, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee and as chairman of the subcommittee having in charge the matter of displaced persons, a statement made to me by a person in authority in Germany, an employee of the Displaced Persons Commission, who I believe made the statement freely and voluntarily. It was published, and this morning there appears in the Washington Post a statement purporting to come from Mr. Carusi, Chairman of the Displaced Persons Commission, in which, about as strongly as he dared, he attempts to call the chairman of the Judiciary Committee a liar.

It is not often the chairman of the Judiciary Committee is called a liar by one holding a place such as that occupied by Mr. Carusi. I have had inserted in the RECORD the matter which has just been read by the clerk, and I am wondering whether Mr. Carusi will now proceed to call the consul general at Munich, Mr. Sam Woods, a liar, and whether he will take Mr. Sam Woods to task, as he says he has taken the employee of the Displaced Persons Commission to task for having made statements to me. The statement just read by the clerk is a statement on file with the State Department, made by an official of the State Department, unhesitatingly, and it shows, as did the statements of the witnesses who testified before me in Stuttgart and Munich, that there is continual fraud in the matter of securing visas for displaced persons.

It was stated to me in Europe, not once, but repeatedly, that for a package of cigarettes one could get a birth certificate; for a package of cigarettes one could get affidavits showing his residence to be at a certain place at a certain time, when he was not there at all. All those statements are at the present time in the possession of the Judiciary Committee, and of a subcommittee thereof and no doubt will be disclosed. But, now that Mr. Carusi has seen fit to call the chairman of the Judiciary Committee a liar for having released the statement of a witness, I am wondering whether he is going to call Sam Woods a liar. If he does, I merely want to tell Mr. Carusi that I shall have more material for him, and by the time he gets through with his Ananias club, it is going to be a real organization.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY] in line 10, page 4, of the original bill.

RECESS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I understand there are to be a number of other speakers, both for and against the pending measure, and in view of the fact that the hour is now 5 o'clock, I presume we should probably take a recess until tomorrow. I should like to ask Senators who are interested in the bill whether they feel that we might be able to get a unanimous-consent agreement for a vote sometime soon on the bill and all amendments.

Mr. LANGER. I do not think we can get a unanimous-consent agreement tonight, but perhaps we may tomorrow.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator. Under those circumstances, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, January 12, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 11 (legislative day of January 4), 1950:

SENATE

THURSDAY, JANUARY 12, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 4, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, this sacred altar at which our spirits bow in the midst of another day's demands is the witness of our weakness and of how fruitless are our quests and how futile are our arguments if we turn not to Thee in the humility of prayer. In these fateful days for whose decisions the future will judge us, by Thine enabling might may we maintain our integrity unsullied by animosities, prejudices, or personal ambitions, regarding always public office as a sacred trust. As our frail hands have a part in the shaping of the world that is to be, give to us the vision, the wisdom, and the courage that will make for both justice and lasting peace. In the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

ATTENDANCE OF A SENATOR

EDWIN C. JOHNSON, a Senator from the State of Colorado, appeared in his seat today.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. LUCAS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, January 11, 1950, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senators be allowed to present petitions and memorials, introduce bills and resolutions, and submit reports and other routine matters for the RECORD without debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPORT OF ECONOMIC COOPERATION ADMINISTRATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States of America:

I am transmitting herewith the sixth report of the Economic Cooperation Administration created by the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948, Public Law 472 of the Eightieth Congress, approved April 3, 1948.

The report covers activities under the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948 (title I of Public Law 472, as amended) as well as the programs of economic aid to China under section 12 of Public Law 47, Eighty-first Congress, and to the Republic of Korea under the provisions of the Foreign Aid Appropriation Act of 1949 (Public Law 793, 80th Cong.) and Public Laws 154 and 196, Eighty-first Congress. There is also included in the appendix a summary of the status of the United States foreign relief program (Public Law 84, 80th Cong.) and the United States foreign aid program (Public Law 389, 80th Cong.).

This report is for the quarter ended September 30, 1949.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 12, 1950.

COMMITTEE SERVICE

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, since there are three new Members of the Senate it is necessary to rearrange committee assignments. It is my understanding that those on the Republican side of the aisle in charge of committee assignments are ready to report their assignments to committees, and we on the Democratic side are ready to make such a report. I now send to the desk an order which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Mr. ROBERTSON be excused from further service as a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and assigned to service on the Committee on Appropriations;

That Mr. TAYLOR be excused from further service as a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and the Committee on Rules and Administration and assigned to service on the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs;

That Mr. LEAHY be excused from further service as a member of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and assigned to service on the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service;

That Mr. MYERS be excused from further service as a member of the Committee on Rules and Administration and assigned to service on the Committee on Finance;

That Mr. WITHERS be excused from further service as a member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and assigned to service on the Committee on the Judiciary;

That Mr. GRAHAM be excused from further service as a member of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and assigned to service on the Committee on Rules and Administration;

That Mr. BENTON be assigned to service on the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and the Committee on Rules and Administration;

That Mr. LEHMAN be assigned to service on the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, on behalf of the minority I send to the desk an order for committee assignments which I ask to have read, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Mr. CAIN be, and he is hereby, excused from further service as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency and assigned to service on the Committee on Armed Services;

That Mr. DWORSHAK be, and he is hereby, assigned to service on the Committee on the District of Columbia and to service on the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service;

That Mr. DARBY be, and he is hereby, assigned to service on the Committee on the District of Columbia and to service on the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service;

That Mr. IVES be, and he is hereby, excused from further service as a member of the Committee on Rules and Administration, and assigned to service on the Committee on Banking and Currency;

That Mr. MUNDT be, and he is hereby, excused from further service as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and assigned to service on the Committee on Rules and Administration;

That Mr. WILLIAMS be, and he is hereby, excused from further service on the Committee on Finance, and assigned to service on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the committee assignments as read, are agreed to.

PETITION

Mr. GREEN presented a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, which was referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Resolution memorializing Congress with relation to enactment of legislation to incorporate the principle of reinsurance as a means of enabling the Federal Government to assume its responsibilities in financing the unemployment compensation program and thereby equalizing the tax burden among the States

Whereas Rhode Island has few natural resources and is dependent on light manufacturing industries; and

Whereas the economy of Rhode Island and that of other industrialized States depends largely upon a demand for our manufactured products which is far beyond a State's border to contain and far beyond a State's power to control; and

Whereas these and most causes of unemployment are national in scope; and

Whereas the effects of unemployment fall unevenly upon the highly industrialized States, of which Rhode Island is one; and

Whereas this results in a severe drain on the Rhode Island unemployment compensation fund, placing this State in an unfavorable, competitive position with other States not so severely affected; and

Whereas President Harry S. Truman has proposed that the Federal Government assume its responsibilities with reference thereto: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations hereby memorializes and petitions the Congress of the United States to pass, and the President of the United States to approve, if passed, legislation which would incorporate the principle of reinsurance as a means of enabling the Federal Government to assume its responsibility in financing in part the unemployment compensation program and thereby equalizing the tax burden among the States; and be it further

Resolved, That duly certified copies of this resolution be transmitted forthwith by the secretary of state to the President of the United States and to each of the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States, earnestly requesting the latter to use their efforts to be certain that legislation is enacted which would carry out the purposes of this resolution.

PROHIBITION OF LIQUOR ADVERTISING—PETITIONS

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, yesterday I presented to the Senate petitions sent to me by Mrs. Nora B. Powell, State legislative director, WCTU, New Castle, Del., signed by 1,637 citizens of New Castle County, Del., and 353 citizens of Kent County, Del., in support of legislation now pending before the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to prohibit the advertising of alcoholic beverages over the radio. I have today received another letter from Mrs. Powell transmitting similar petitions signed by 71 citizens of New Castle County, Del., and 75 citizens of Kent County, Del. I ask that these petitions also be referred to the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petitions will be received and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ATTACKS BY CHINESE ON AMERICAN-FLAG SHIPS—PETITION OF ISBRANDTSEN CO., INC., NEW YORK

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, it seems likely that each Member of the Congress has received a copy of the petition which the Isbrandtsen Co., Inc., seeks to have considered by the Congress. I have read and become curious about the copy of the petition which was sent to my office. Knowing absolutely nothing about the stated complaints and alleged facts I ask unanimous consent that the petition be printed in the RECORD in hope that an answer to the petition will be prepared by the executive agencies referred to in the petition, and offered to the junior Senator from Washington for insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A PETITION BY THE ISBRANDTSEN CO.

To the Congress of the United States.

HONORABLE SIRS: Our company has been engaged for many years in world-wide cargo- and passenger-ship operations and merchandising. At times we have operated over 50 large ships in all parts of the world and employ hundreds of American citizens on our vessels and ashore whose homes and families are in almost every State in the Union.

ATTACKS BY THE CHINESE ON OUR AMERICAN-FLAG SHIPS AND THE AMERICAN CITIZENS ABROAD

You undoubtedly have read, recently, in the press about the experiences through which our American-flag ships have gone, in conducting their regular and long-established course of trade in the Far East and especially on the high seas, off the mouth of the Yangtze River, at the approaches to the port of Shanghai, China.

In September, two of our American-flag ships, the Flying Independent and the Flying Clipper were, under threats of shelling, stopped by Chinese gunboats, on the high seas, outside the entrance to the Yangtze River and were then seized and taken to a Nationalist Chinese naval base on the Chusan Islands and were held under seizure for 10 days before being released, notwithstanding there were aboard over a hundred passengers, including refugees from Shanghai—whom the American consul at Shanghai beseeched us to take aboard—as well as the American crews.

In November, two more of our American-flag ships, the Flying Cloud and the Sir John Franklin, were actually fired upon, on the high seas, off the mouth of the Yangtze River, and were severely damaged by a barrage of shells from those Chinese gunboats, seriously endangering the lives of more than a hundred American citizens aboard those ships. Ironically, those same Chinese gunboats, we are informed, are former United States warships, which were among the 132 war vessels presented to the Chinese Government by our Government.

NO LAWFUL OR RECOGNIZED BLOCKADE, OR BELLIGERENT RIGHT TO STOP OR ATTACK AMERICAN SHIPS ON THE HIGH SEAS EXISTS

Before sending our ships, in September and November, on voyages bound for Shanghai, we consulted, at length, with the Department of State, in reference to a reported blockade of that port, announced on June 20, 1949, by the Chinese Nationalists. Secretary of State Acheson informed us, unequivocally, in writing, on September 16, 1949, that the United States Government does not recognize the purported blockade of Chinese ports by the Nationalist Government of China.

THE UNITED STATES PROTESTED AGAINST THE UNLAWFULNESS OF THE BLOCKADE, OR PORT-CLOSURE ORDER

Secretary Acheson also informed us that he had, on June 25, 1949, filed official United States protest against the purported and announced blockade, or port-closure order, on the ground that it was unlawful under international law and invalid, and would not be recognized by the United States.

Mr. Acheson also informed us that the United States does not recognize the existence in China, of any kind of war, civil or otherwise, and that, accordingly, the Nationalist China Navy has no belligerent rights on the high seas or elsewhere, because it is not a recognized belligerent. He has stated that nobody but a belligerent has a right to stop or attack an American ship on the high seas, or to declare a blockade, or to interfere in any way with an American ship on the high seas.

Proceeding on that official advice, when our two American ships, the Flying Independent and the Flying Clipper, under threat, by radio, of gunfire, were stopped on the high seas, by Chinese gunboats, while en route toward the mouth of the Yangtze River, and were seized and taken to the distant Chusan Islands, we appealed urgently to the Navy Department, and to the State Department, for protection against such clearly unlawful actions. The Navy Department, however, arbitrarily refused to afford protection, notwithstanding the acts of Congress requiring it to do so, and the only satisfaction we obtained from the State Department was the information that it had asked an American consul, in China, for a report on the incident.

On October 5, 1949, however, the Acting Secretary of State publicly announced, through the press, that the Chinese Nationalist Government had been warned that the United States would view seriously any attack on American ships under the purported port-closure or blockade either by Chinese warships or by Chinese airplanes.

THE UNLAWFUL ATTACKS ON, AND SHELLING OF, THE "FLYING CLOUD" AND THE "SIR JOHN FRANKLIN," AND THE ATTEMPTED MURDER OF AMERICAN CREWS AND PASSENGERS

On November 15, 1949, our American-flag ship, the steamship Flying Cloud, while upon the high seas, was fired upon by a barrage of direct shelling from 3-inch guns, by these Chinese gunboats, and was barely able to escape and reach another port.

On November 25, 1949, a like attack was made on our American-flag ship, the Sir John Franklin, while on the high seas.

It is only a miracle that the many American members of our crews, and the American passengers on board those two ships, were not killed or severely injured. Photos taken of the Flying Cloud, after the attack on her, show that one shot went straight through the ship's American flag, and that a hole 13 inches in diameter was blown through the ship's side. On the Sir John Franklin, one 3-inch shell exploded close to the bridge and was clearly aimed by the Chinese directly at the American master and American officers on the bridge.

OUR GOVERNMENT PROTESTED AGAINST THE ATTACKS ON THE "FLYING CLOUD" AND ON THE "SIR JOHN FRANKLIN," ON THE GROUND THAT THEY WERE UNLAWFUL

On November 18 the State Department filed with the Chinese Nationalist Government, and published in full in the newspapers, a protest against the Chinese attack on the Flying Cloud, on the ground that it was unlawful.

On November 28 the State Department also filed with the Chinese Nationalist Government, and published in full in the newspapers, a like protest against the Chinese attack on the Sir John Franklin on the ground that it was unlawful.

Both protests of the United States Government were arbitrarily rejected by the Chinese Nationalist Government, and no denial was made of the attacks or that they were unlawful. And there the matter was allowed to rest.

"ON OUR OWN," SAYS THE SECRETARY OF STATE

To all our protests to the Navy Department and to the State Department, and our requests for protection, from our Navy, for our ships while on the high seas, the Navy Department referred us to the State Department and the Secretary of State merely reiterated that we were "on our own," and that our American ships, although on admittedly lawful voyages, were proceeding at their own risk, even on the high seas, toward the mouth of the Yangtze River—adding, probably intended as our only comfort, that, of course, "the action of the Chinese naval vessel in indiscriminately and wantonly firing on an American-flag ship and thus endangering American lives was unjustifiable and contrary to the law and practice of nations" and "the United States Government holds the Chinese Nationalist Government fully responsible for any losses sustained by American nationals as a result of these reckless acts."

The ultimate measure of that responsibility in American dollars is highly conjectural. We are contending here for principle, not damages.

We contend for the historic and constitutional American policy of protection by our Navy and Congress for law-abiding American citizens on American ships on the high seas—wherever they may be on the high seas—against admittedly lawless attack.

The Secretary of State continued, however, to repeat, on his own responsibility, that the Navy would not furnish any escort, or protection, as the English had provided for their ships, or furnish our American ships, or to the American passengers, or to the American crews, any safeguard, whatsoever, while lawfully on the high seas, and the nearby Navy ships did not in fact respond or come to the aid of the American ships, after their masters had sent distress signals, radioing for Navy assistance, while being actually attacked.

We have lodged with the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Navy opinions of one of our counsel that those Departments of our Government had no lawful authority to ignore or set aside the United States Navy regulations, articles 0320, 0313, and 0314, issued pursuant to acts of Congress, and having the force of statute law, imposing the statutory and mandatory duty on the Navy of protecting American ships, crews, and passengers against lawless attack. Those opinions of our counsel have been published in the press and are available, upon request.

We have never been able to comprehend, by what authority the State Department has assumed to speak for the Navy, but the Navy apparently has defaulted to the State Department, as its spokesman—and this despite the published United States Navy Regulations and Articles for the Government of the Navy of the United States (sec. 8, clause 20; sec. 1624 Rev. Stat.) imposing the statutory duty on all senior naval officers to render assistance and protection to American citizens and property whenever in danger (see United States Navy Regulations, 1948, arts. 0320, 0313, and 0314).

AMERICAN WARSHIPS STOOD NEARBY, BUT OFFERED NO AID

There is a large naval force or naval task force, in these waters, on the high seas off the China coast, readily available for those purposes, and, we understand, regularly assigned to the mission, or task, of protecting all American life and property in an area off the China coast, including the very place on the high seas, off the mouth of the Yangtze River, where all of the attacks on our American ships have been made, and where the Chinese Nationalists have within the last week claimed that they have been laying mines indiscriminately, to blow up American ships, crews, and passengers, notwithstanding that our American ships have been at all times carefully observing all the laws of the United States and the rules of international law. That naval force has an admiral in command of the United States naval forces, western Pacific. All of the United States Navy warships in that naval force are, however, apparently following orders from the Secretary of State, to pay no attention to the shelling of American ships and the attempted murder of American crews and passengers by admittedly lawless Chinese warships. Such an attitude constitutes the first occasion in the history of the United States when the Navy has so stood aloof from its sworn and statutory duties, as imposed by acts of Congress (secs. 1547 and 1624, Rev. Stat.), in Navy Regulations and in the Articles for the Government of the Navy (sec. 8, clause 20).

Congress, and not the Secretary of State, has the constitutional power and jurisdiction over American ships, crews, and passengers on the high seas, and over the regulation or restriction of American foreign commerce or shipping, and also over the Navy, during peace, in protecting Americans on the high seas. Those are domestic matters, between Congress and American citizens, and are not subject to arbitrary regulation by the Secretary of State, by directing the setting aside or the evasion of acts of Congress or the Navy Regulations and Articles.

THE LATEST CLAIM OF THE CHINESE NATIONALIST NAVY THAT IT HAS LAWLESSLY LAID MINES INDISCRIMINATELY ON THE HIGH SEAS OFF THE MOUTH OF THE YANGTZE RIVER TO BLOW UP AMERICAN SHIPS HAS NOT CHANGED THE SITUATION

Within the last week the Chinese Nationalist Navy has made a claim that it has laid mines on the high seas at the place where the attacks on our American ships by gunfire have already been made. The State Department has made no statement or finding of its own that the present Chinese Nationalist Navy's claim that it has laid mines there is true or correct in fact. Our own investigation to date has disclosed that no Chinese Nationalist Navy ship or supposed mine layer has approached closer to land or shore than 8 miles from shore, which is well out on the high seas, and outside Chinese territorial waters, so that any possible mines would have to be laid on the high seas. It is just as unlawful to attack American ships by laying mines indiscriminately on the high seas as it is to shoot at them on the high seas, so that the claimed mine laying does not change the situation, excepting to further emphasize the urgent need of American ships for the Navy to furnish the protection guaranteed by Congress and commanded in Navy regulations.

WE BOUGHT OUR SHIPS FROM OUR GOVERNMENT

All these American-flag ships of ours have each a capacity of about 10,000 tons and were purchased by us from the United States Maritime Commission. They were built by our Government during the war, and thus are entirely American ships.

THE STATE DEPARTMENT THREATENS OUR MASTERS

The latest disturbing, unauthorized, and extraordinary conduct of the State Department has been to announce, through its consuls, in Korea and other ports in the Far East, that "violation of the warning (of the Secretary of State) will render masters of United States-flag vessels liable to action under Revised Statute, section 4450," which is the law providing for revocation of a master's license for incompetence and misconduct, etc. Of course, any such action, aimed at taking away the licenses of our American captains, would necessarily have to be initiated and determined by the United States Coast Guard, which is under the jurisdiction of our Treasury Department—not the State Department.

Again, we are puzzled at the confusion of jurisdiction, because we are unable to comprehend by what authority, or voluntary surrender of jurisdiction, the State Department speaks for the Coast Guard, or its superior, the Treasury Department.

So the matter stands at this hour with more of our United States-flag ships en route to the still lawfully open port of Shanghai.

The State Department still refuses assistance; the Secretary of State announced, for the Navy, that our armed services will not obey their oaths or duty under acts of Congress and Navy regulations and articles, to come to the assistance of endangered American lives and property; the State Department threatens our masters with revocation of their licenses—we assume through some action which should be initiated by the separate Treasury Department—through our Coast Guard. And let us emphasize that at no time has the Secretary of State seen fit to forbid our vessels to go to Shanghai, although his determination on such an edict has been expressly requested of the Secretary of State.

LABOR JOINS IN PROTESTING TO THE STATE DEPARTMENT

This conglomeration of Government authority, and its threats, are most disturbing, not only to us but to countless others, including not only shippers, exporters, and importers but all the American officers and crews on our ships.

For instance, the National Maritime Union, representing our unlicensed crews, and the National Master Mates and Pilots Association, representing our officers on board, have vigorously protested to the Secretary of State at the complete confusion and his refusal to afford protection. Especially are these labor organizations incensed at this latest threat of reprisal on the American masters by revocation of their licenses.

ANSWERING SOME SMEARS

Because certain items may have come to your attention, which have usually and persistently been fabricated to confuse the issue involved, we comment on a few here.

NO MUNITIONS CARRIED

The cargoes we have taken into Shanghai have usually originated in the Chinese port of Hong Kong and have consisted principally of foodstuffs, textiles, and medicine, with no munitions among them, whatsoever.

Incidentally, other American steamship lines—with no warning from the Secretary of State—including one line owned and controlled by an agency of the United States Government, have called, and are calling, with like cargo, regularly, at other ports in China—such as Tientsin—all ports held by the Communists. Also other American steamship lines, with no objection from the State Department, are regularly carrying the same kind of cargoes directly to ports of the Soviet Union.

Before our ships leave Hong Kong, bound for Shanghai, they and their cargoes are always officially cleared by the United States consul at Hong Kong, who would not issue such clearance if any war materials, as defined by the Munitions Board's or the Department of Commerce's lists, were on board.

The cargoes we have taken out of Shanghai have been consigned mostly to American citizens, and in the United States—and have consisted generally of strategic or short materials needed in the United States. Again, full clearance has always been granted by the United States consul at Shanghai, still functioning in that Communist-held city—despite the attitude of the Secretary of State toward us calling at that port.

Such goods, transported by us in either direction, have made up a comparatively small portion of the total capacity of these American ships.

PROFITS?

Likewise, do we meet the deliberate smear, that we are interested in profits on these transactions. That is a complete falsehood, if it had any relevancy to the fundamental principle involved, for which we are fighting. The extra cost of such transportation, including increased insurance, wages, bonuses to the crews, etc., make any profit problematical, if real. In any event, if there are any profits—a result which we understand has not yet been outlawed in this country—any residue, after the payment of taxes, remains in this country.

WE ARE AN AMERICAN COMPANY

Another deliberate smear about us dealing with Communists is succinctly answered by our repeated statements, by our 100 percent American company—all of whose officers, directors, and stockholders are American citizens—that of the various political ideologies throughout the world, the ports of which we serve, the only one ideology in which we are in the slightest degree interested, or to which we in any respect subscribe, is the American ideology—the American way.

The fifth amendment to our Constitution guarantees us that our own Government will protect us against being deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

THE OPEN-DOOR POLICY

That American way of free enterprise encompasses the open-door policy of free access, enforced by our Government over all the years, and throughout all the world, that is, until recently.

The book John Hay, by Tyler Dennett (1934), states (p. 198) when "the Department of State was a small and relatively private affair * * * with a staff of about 60 people, among whom perhaps 8 were carrying the load," it is recorded (p. 299) that on June 10, 1900, Secretary Hay telegraphed E. H. Conger, the American Minister in Peking: "We have no policy in China except to protect with energy American interests, and especially American citizens, and the legation."

CONGRESS ALONE HAS JURISDICTION

As American citizens, we address our Congress, particularly because commerce and the free movement of American ships and crews on the high seas, cannot be restricted except by legislative power. The Secretary of State, or the Secretary of the Navy, or the Commandant of the Coast Guard, have no such legislative power, nor even the President. Congress exclusively controls commercial relations and American ships on the high seas, and the Secretary of State and President control only diplomatic relations with recognized foreign governments with respect to Americans, and their property, actually within that foreign country, and this does not include under any circumstances the regulation or restriction of American commerce or shipping.

There exists no act of Congress, or any other valid law or regulation, prohibiting American ships from calling at Shanghai, or from navigating in the area on the high seas, within which our ships were attacked and are now being threatened with further attack. Nor has the Secretary of State issued any order prohibiting ships from proceeding in these waters. Nor is there any act of Congress authorizing him or the Secretary of the Navy to issue any such prohibition.

The right of American ships to call at Shanghai is further secured by the treaty of May 20, 1943, between the United States and China, and by a series of earlier similar treaties.

It has long been a truism of the international relations between our country and other nations, that our weakness is their strength.

Our regular, fixed schedule of sailings, to accommodate the commerce of the United States, calls for the sailing of more of our American-flag ships into Shanghai. Other ships are scheduled to enter that port any day now.

Is this unlawful shelling of our American-flag ships going to be permitted to continue, unchallenged?

What right has any Chinese Government to establish danger zones for our United States ships?

PROMPT ACTION IS VITAL—WHAT CONGRESS CAN DO

Members of Congress: Will you, after reading the foregoing, and otherwise satisfying yourselves of this immediately desperate situation, take action toward affording relief, in the circumstances?

Please: First, place this petition in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Second, communicate your views to the Secretaries of State, the armed services, the Navy and the Treasury, and to the Commandant of the Coast Guard.

Third, introduce in your respective bodies, appropriate resolutions, joint, or otherwise, calling for the immediate investigation of these incidents, by a special committee, or by one of the appropriate standing committees, on Armed Services, or Foreign Relations, or Foreign Affairs, or Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the Senate or the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House.

Fourth. We call your attention to the provisions of article I, section 8, of our United States Constitution:

"The Congress shall have power * * * To * * * grant letters of marque and reprisal."

Only under such a commission, issued by you, would we be authorized to arm our ships, to defend them, and our people, from the admittedly piratical and unlawful attacks, against which the duly constituted officials of our own Government refuse to offer any defense. Must American citizens be compelled to even suggest such drastic relief?

There the matter presently rests—in the hands of you gentlemen, the 531 duly elected Representatives of all our people—the constitutional superiors of each and all of the afore-mentioned public officials.

After having, as a last resort, utilized our sacred and inviolable, constitutional guaranty of the right to petition the Government for a redress of grievances (Bill of Rights amendment 1) we can do no more.

Respectfully yours,

ISBRANDTSEN CO., INC.,
By HANS J. ISBRANDTSEN,
President.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

As in executive session,

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Finance:

Denis J. McMahon, of New York, N. Y., to be collector of internal revenue for the second district of New York, to fill an existing vacancy;

George T. Cromwell, of Ferndale, Md., to be collector of customs for customs collection district No. 13, with headquarters at Baltimore, Md. (reappointment);

James J. Connors, of Juneau, Alaska, to be collector of customs for customs collection district No. 31, with headquarters at Juneau, Alaska (reappointment); and Harry A. Zinn, of Denver, Colo., to be collector of customs for customs collection district No. 47, with headquarters at Denver, Colo. (reappointment).

By Mr. MAYBANK, from the Committee on Banking and Currency:

James E. Webb, of North Carolina, to be United States Alternate Governor of the International Monetary Fund, and United States Alternate Governor of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development for a term of 5 years;

William McChesney Martin, Jr., of New York, to be United States Executive Director of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development for a term of 2 years; and John S. Hooker, of Maryland, to be United States Alternate Executive Director of the International Monetary Fund for a term of 2 years and until his successor has been appointed, to which office he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LODGE:

S. 2838. A bill for the relief of John Bernard McBride; to the Committee on Armed Services.

S. 2839. A bill authorizing the naturalization of Nicholas George Strangas; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GREEN:

S. 2840. A bill for the relief of Adam Papachristopoulos; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SALTONSTALL:

S. 2841. A bill to authorize the issuance of a special series of stamps commemorative of the one hundredth anniversary of the death of John James Audubon; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

S. 2842. A bill for the relief of Arno Edvin Kolm; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SALTONSTALL (for himself and Mr. LODGE):

S. 2843. A bill for the relief of Sisters Pasqualina Bova, Rosa Pellanda, Emilia Dei Rossi, Speranza Zoia, and Domenica Lapadula; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McCARRAN:

S. 2844. A bill for the relief of Biagio Poidimani; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. KNOWLAND (for himself and Mr. SMITH of New Jersey) introduced Senate bill 2845, to enable the President to obligate funds heretofore appropriated for assistance in certain areas in China until June 30, 1950, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. KEFAUVER:

S. 2846. A bill for the relief of the United Transformer Corp.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. YOUNG:

S. J. Res. 141. Joint resolution to change the name of the reservoir to be formed above Garrison Dam and known as Garrison Reservoir or Garrison Lake, to Lake Thompson; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

ECONOMIC AID TO CHINA

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] and myself, I introduce a bill which proposes to extend title 4 of the ECA Act, insofar as it relates to economic aid for China, from its present termination date of February 15, to the end of the fiscal year June 30, 1950. Inasmuch as the President indicated recently that he was favorably disposed toward economic aid, I hope this will meet with his approval.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2845) to enable the President to obligate funds heretofore appropriated for assistance in certain areas in China until June 30, 1950, introduced by Mr. KNOWLAND (for himself and Mr. SMITH of New Jersey), was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

CONSTRUCTION, REPAIR, AND PRESERVATION OF CERTAIN PUBLIC WORKS—AMENDMENT

Mr. LODGE (for himself and Mr. SALTONSTALL) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the bill (H. R. 5472) authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors for navigation, flood control, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, and by unanimous consent, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was authorized to hold hearings this afternoon and tomorrow afternoon on the Langer bill.

On request of Mr. MAYBANK and by unanimous consent the housing subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee was authorized to hold a hearing this afternoon.

WARREN R. AUSTIN

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I rise to pay tribute to a fellow Vermonter well known to this body, and whose seat on this floor I now have the privilege of filling.

At the suggestion of the American Legion, the school children of Vermont are today honoring their greatest fellow citizen, Warren R. Austin, United States Ambassador to the United Nations. I wish to put on record at this time my own personal tribute to his character and services, so that they may be recognized here at the same time that the school children of Vermont are drawing inspiration from his useful life and public achievements.

Warren Austin was born in the town of Highgate, in the extreme northwestern corner of Vermont, by the shores of Lake Champlain, and close to the Canadian boundary. After completing his public-school education, he went to the University of Vermont, from which he was graduated in 1899; and then for 3 years he studied law in his father's law office in St. Albans. This was the old-fashioned way in which so many of the outstanding members of the legal profession have gained their education and experience. For 14 years he practiced as a member of his father's firm, and then removed to Burlington, Vermont's largest city, where he established his own law firm, still ably carried on by his son, who thus is third in line of succession in the profession of this notable Vermont family.

His public service commenced with his election as State's attorney of Franklin County in 1904 and United States commissioner in 1907. In 1909 he was elected mayor of St. Albans. He spent a period in 1916 and 1917 as an attorney for the American International Corp. in China, and there got his first practical experience in foreign affairs—the field in which he has become so distinguished. In a special election in March of 1931 he was elected to the United States Senate to fill out the unexpired term of Senator Frank L. Greene. He was reelected in 1934, and again in 1940.

It is not necessary for me to detail his services as a member of the United States Senate. They speak for themselves, and are carried in the memories of many men who have their seats upon this floor. He was a hard-working Senator, constructive in committee work, and wise in counsel. Vermont was proud of him. He was a member of the Atomic Energy Committee, the Committees on Territories and Insular Affairs, on Military Affairs, and on Interstate Commerce. As a member of the Military Affairs Committee he shared the responsibility of introducing the first armed-services-unification bill. He early saw the inevitability of our involvement in world conflict. Both on the floor of the Senate and among his constituents in Vermont he led in the movement which finally provided for the draft and put our Nation in a state of military preparedness. But it was his assignment to the Committee on Foreign Relations which particularly intrigued his interests, and on which he rendered his most valuable service.

It was with the conviction that the President had made a wise choice that the people of our State received the news of his appointment to his present high office. The wisdom of that choice has been increasingly evident during the years that Ambassador Austin has fulfilled the requirements of the difficult and dangerous assignment which was given him. His patience, his intelligence, his wide knowledge of international situations, and his devotion to the cause of peace among the nations of the earth are known to all.

There is a parallel between his personal history and that of our country in the years since his birth in 1877. The country boy grew up, went to school, prepared himself for professional work, and entered doors that were opened to him time after time into fields of greater usefulness and responsibility. As in the case of the man, so also in the case of our country: We have grown; we have learned; we have found unavoidable responsibilities thrust upon us; and inevitably we have become responsible leaders in world affairs, just as Ambassador Austin, through the inevitability of his experience, judgment, and character, has grown to play the leading part in the broadest theater and the most stirring drama that has ever appeared on the stage of human history.

Vermont is proud of its son; and I am glad, as one of his fellow citizens, to add my word of tribute to the work and worth of Warren Robinson Austin.

LOCATION OF STEEL MILL IN NEW ENGLAND—LETTER FROM SENATOR McMAHON TO SENATOR O'MAHONEY

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a letter which I wrote to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], chairman of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report, under date of January 5, 1950, concerning hearings which his committee will begin on January 24 relative to the steel situation in the United States. In my letter to the Senator from Wyoming I have outlined the situation as it pertains to New England and New England's determination to go forward with the securing of steel production facilities in the New England area.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 5, 1950.

Hon. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
Chairman, Joint Committee on the Economic Report,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR O'MAHONEY: I wish to commend the Joint Committee on the Economic Report, of which you are chairman, for its decision to explore current steel prices and their effect on the national economy. This inquiry should yield fruitful results.

I am especially pleased that you have asked to appear as a witness, Dr. Alfred C. Neal, vice president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston, who is in a position to offer facts and figures which should prove of substantial value to the work of the committee. Dr. Neal is an eminent economist who is thoroughly familiar with the steel situation both nationally and locally.

For some time past, the New England Council has sponsored an effort to locate in New England a steel mill of sufficient size to help meet the growing demands for steel in that area.

New England has an abundance of metal fabricating plants which are vital to its continued prosperity and the undisputed fact is that New England has been handicapped by a lack of sufficient steel for many years past. This has placed a severe hardship upon the economy of the whole New England area.

There are now available around the rim of the Atlantic Ocean ore deposits which are more than sufficient in size and quality to supply a New England steel mill at prices substantially below those now prevailing in the steel industry. New England has the financial resources and the available markets. There is every economic reason why a steel plant should be located in New England to meet the needs of an expanding economy.

Our system of private enterprise cannot be static; it must be dynamic to meet the growing needs of our people. A steel mill in New England would not constitute a threat to present steel facilities; on the contrary it would complement those now in existence.

The New England Council has sought the cooperation of those producing steel companies which possess the experience and technical skills to operate a steel mill of the proposed scope. This policy was adopted in the belief that the project would be mutually advantageous and a wholesome development for the Nation's economy.

It is unpleasant but true that there has developed what seems to be a concerted effort among leading steel producers to oppose the development of a steel mill in New England. This opposition is based, not upon economic grounds, but upon reasons which certainly will bear the most careful scrutiny by your committee. I believe it is beyond dispute that the normal economic growth of the Nation must not be impeded by artificial restraints imposed by a small group of willful men.

In a recent message, President Truman wished the New England Council "every success in working out a satisfactory arrangement with the steel companies." The Chief Executive thus expressed the universal belief that the operation of a steel mill in New England, under private auspices, would be a healthy thing for the economy of the United States.

Steel is the hard core of modern industrial life. In a very real sense, the availability of steel expands or retards our national prosperity. Steel in sufficient quantities at reasonable prices is vital to the growth and development of New England.

I may add that New England will have a steel mill, despite the outspoken or undercover hostility of special interests which may oppose it. But I believe your committee will perform a distinct public service by placing the facts before the public.

With best wishes,

Sincerely yours,

BRIEN MCMAHON,
United States Senator.

LABOR-RELATIONS POLICY—ARTICLE BY THOMAS L. STOKES

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, one of the most pressing problems facing the Congress of the United States is that of our country's labor-relations policy. The debate during the first session of the Eighty-first Congress on the Thomas bill to repeal the Taft-Hartley law demonstrated to my mind proof of the conclusion that the Taft-Hartley law has created a climate in labor relations which is conducive more toward hostility, bitterness, and interference with the civil rights of vast numbers of American working men and women than toward a firm basis for friendly and constructive collective bargaining. That debate has ended, and for the time being the Taft-Hartley issue is not on the floor of the Senate. It may well be that the American electorate again will have to express itself at the polls before its will to repeal the Taft-Hartley law can be expressed in legislation.

We do have a responsibility, however, to face the facts. In many sections of America the labor movement faces a struggle for its very existence, as employers who choose to interfere with attempts of their employees to organize into unions of their own choosing receive encouragement from the Taft-Hartley law. Here is a most serious problem involving basic civil rights.

A subcommittee on labor-management relations has been appointed by the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee. I am a member of that subcommittee, and I urged the subcommittee to concern itself with this problem and inform the American people of the facts.

In this connection I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a recent article by Thomas L. Stokes, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare for consideration by that subcommittee.

There being no objection, the article was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN OLD TRICK REAPPEARS

(By Thomas L. Stokes)

WASHINGTON.—There is much loose talk about big labor and the labor monopoly.

It refers to giant unions embracing, in some cases, hundreds of thousands of workers in basic industries—coal, steel, automobiles, and the like. They were organized on an industry-wide scale to meet the corporate power of giant industry with which they had to deal.

But there is one part of the country where they haven't seen much labor monopoly. That is the South, where the monopoly power seems still to be on the other side. Tradeunionism is in the pioneer era yet in some respects and encounters old tricks abandoned long ago elsewhere.

There is, for example, the illuminating case history of two textile mills in northern Alabama, at Albertsville and Guntersville in the heart of the TVA area, formerly the Saratoga-Victory Mills which employed 750 persons. The workers there were organized into unions of the Textile Workers Union of America and contracts went into effect July 1, 1946.

Last spring the two plants were closed down with the announcement that they could not be operated profitably. Immediately things began to happen.

The supervisory force left at the plants, under direction of W. H. McGaha, began a campaign to break up the union.

The first tactics were to circulate printed cards to the workers authorizing withdrawal from the union. In July the tactics became more direct. Through an employee of the Albertsville plant the superintendent had the word passed around among former workers that there was a prospective buyer for the mill who operated nine other nonunion plants. The deal would not go through, the workers were informed, if there was a union at the plant.

Since the plant had been closed 3 months by that time, this was persuasive with a number of workers who needed jobs.

At Guntersville, Mr. McGaha told a committee of former employees that it would begin operations if the workers would sign a petition saying they would not join a union.

The plot unfolded neatly in early October when sale of the plants was announced to the J. R. Abney interests of Anderson, S. C. The mills were reopened October 17. In its rehiring, the company avoided workers formerly active in the union and hired some persons who had not worked in cotton mills for years and had never worked at either of the two plants.

The union has filed charges with the NLRB, claiming violation of the National Labor Relations Act, listing 400 workers who have been denied employment. It will take a long time for this to go through the procedures and possibly the courts.

The labor monopoly does not seem to work in the South. It is still not so simple as the propaganda makes out.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY] to the original bill, on page 4, after line 10.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, on the floor of the Senate we have been discussing all last week, and up until now of this week, the question of whether we shall repeal the oleomargarine tax. There is very little I can add at this time to the discussion which has previously occurred; but I wish to go on record on this issue, so that everyone will understand my position. I shall not at this time undertake to make any extended remarks; neither am I going to discuss the amendments to the bill. I am speaking purely upon the merits of the proposed repeal of the oleomargarine tax.

So far as the amendments known as the Langer amendments are concerned—which insert into this particular discussion the issues of antipoll tax, antilynching, and FEPC—I certainly would want it understood that the brief remarks I am making here and now do not in any way apply to the amendments which have been offered, for in my opinion the Senate will not seriously consider those amendments at this time, because I believe the Senate as a body realizes that if we should enter upon their discussion and if it became necessary to call for cloture in the Senate, then, of course, the antilynch, antipoll tax, and FEPC issues would be stripped from the bill, and we would consider only the oleomargarine tax. Therefore, it is not for the best interests of the Senate, as I see the situation, to discuss at length these other issues at this time. For that reason, I shall discuss only the oleomargarine tax.

Mr. President, for many decades the margarine industry has been a victim of taxation without representation. For many decades the housewives of this Nation have been unduly charged for a food product which contains many vital minerals necessary for our well-being.

In discussing this tax, I want it also understood that in my view it is more of a consumers' tax than a tax to benefit farmers or a tax to benefit the dairymen or a tax to benefit the oleomargarine industry.

We remember that in 1902, when the Federal Government imposed the tax on margarine, it was said that such laws were needed to safeguard the public from fraud and to protect the public health. Even if at that time margarine was not the nutritious food it is now, the situation could have been dealt with more effectively by stricter pure-food laws. The arguments applying then no longer apply. Today, it is a case of the butter boys against justice. That is my way of looking at it.

Cooking experts say margarine is just as palatable as butter; medical men say it is just as nutritious. Anyone buying groceries knows it costs less; but it should be much less costly than it is.

Both margarine and butter contain 3,300 calories per pound; 80-percent fat by volume; and same percentage skimmilk solids. Three percent of margarine is salt and 3 percent of butter is salt. Sixteen percent of margarine is moisture and 16 of butter is moisture. Does it make sense to the housewives of the country that the Federal Government tax one and not tax the other?

As to color, margarine is colored, and so is butter, 8 months of every year. I have heard a great deal of talk on the Senate floor implying that butter has an exclusive right to the yellow color. As I see it, butter has no more right to the yellow color than has oleomargarine. In a great many instances, oleo must be decolored before it can be sold. As to taxation, the housewife must pay a tax of 10 cents on every pound of colored margarine she buys. The report on margarine by the New York Academy of Medicine states:

From a nutritional viewpoint, when it is fortified with vitamin A in the required amount—

By the way, the law requires that amount—margarine is the equal of butter, containing the same amounts of protein, fat, carbohydrates, and calories per unit of weight. Moreover, since the minimum vitamin A content of enriched margarine is fixed, and the amount of this vitamin in butter may range from 500 to 20,000 units per pound, enriched margarine is a more dependable source of vitamin A than is butter. Since it is a cheaper product than butter, fortified margarine constitutes a good vehicle for the distribution of vitamin A and fats to low-income groups and should, therefore, be made available to them. Under the standards set by the Food and Drug Administration, margarine is as clean and sanitary a food as butter. The two products are likewise equal in digestibility. Their relative palatability is a matter of individual taste.

Some people like the taste of butter, others like taste of oleomargarine better.

Three distinguished scientists at the University of Illinois College of Medicine conducted a 2-year study of 217 children in two orphanages. The children in one were fed margarine while the children in the other were fed butter. The report reads like this:

Blood studies showed that there were no significant differences between the margarine or butter groups.

The children in the margarine group experienced a high degree of good health during the study and in comparing their health to those in the butter group it appears to have been much better.

When infirmary records are compared, it is readily seen that the margarine group fared much better than the butter group. We are not making claims that the margarine group were healthier simply because their diet contained margarine. Other variables are more likely to account for their better health.

In 1886 it was contended that margarine was an unhealthy food and was being sold fraudulently as butter. In 1902, when the original law—which imposed a 2-cent tax on all margarine—was amended to reduce the tax on uncolored margarine and place an almost prohibitive impost on the artificially colored yellow product the argument was again made that consumers must be protected from fraud. In 1931, when the 10-cent tax was extended to all yellow margarine—whether artificially or naturally colored—the contention was made that margarine was a "foreign" product since a great deal of it was being made from imported palm and coconut oil.

I should like to point out here that the foreign argument is of no importance today. More than 95 percent of all margarine is now made of domestic ingredients. This argument is as archaic today as the contention that margarine is an unhealthy food.

There are, of course, no sound reasons for the imposition of these taxes and license fees on margarine, any more than there would be for the imposition of a tax on 10 cents on every pound of butter.

Both margarine and butter are colored yellow to meet food habits. We are accustomed to yellow table spreads just as we are used to white milk. If anyone should try to sell black milk, no one would want to drink it. The same thing is true of butter and of oleomargarine. We would look with distaste upon green milk—though in every respect except color it might be identical with other milk. Our housewives do not object to white margarine for cooking purposes. They are accustomed to white cooking fats—such as lard. But they do want their margarine for table use to be yellow. There is no valid reason why their preference should be ignored or thwarted.

Margarine looks like butter. It is quite amusing to listen to the speeches of those who say they do not want us even to put margarine in a package that makes it look like butter, although it is printed plainly on the package that it is oleomargarine. God made both to look as they look in their natural state.

Furthermore, margarine imitates and is a substitute for butter, but what is wrong with that? If we are to levy a tax on all products which imitate the original, in color and other characteristics, we are going to stifle competition. The very essence of competition is to develop new products which are like the old but which are better and cheaper.

Of course, the supreme irony of this amazing claim of butter to a monopoly on yellow is that the fats and oils used in the manufacture of margarine contain some naturally yellow color. Under Federal regulations, however, these fats and oils must be bleached, a process which adds to the cost of manufacture in order to make white margarine. If the manufacturers did not bleach it, they would violate the law. It would probably be yellow in some instances, and then it would be a direct violation of the law. Otherwise, the margarine resulting would have to pay the 10 cents a pound Federal tax.

The butter boys tell us that this tax was imposed because the Government needed the revenue and to protect the public from fraud. But the people know it was imposed by butter interests in order to outlaw the sale of margarine. The housewives, however, have great faith in margarine and they have continued to buy it. It is only logic to buy margarine because it is as good as butter in every respect and can be made for much less.

Let me also state that it is my humble opinion that so far as putting the butter interests out of business is concerned, the removal of the tax of 10 cents on margarine will not affect in a material way the amount of butter sold, and will not, in any material way, affect the sale of oleomargarine. But repeal will eliminate a tax which I consider inequitable, a tax which has no proper place in our economy, a tax which is nothing more nor less than an imposition on people who are buying oleomargarine.

Spokesmen for the butter industry have made every sort of claim against the margarine industry. They have even said that soybeans, the principal ingredient of margarine, are detrimental to the soil. Contrary to that statement, the soybean plant is a legume; it restores nitrogen to the soil. Any specialist in soil conservation will tell us that all land must be put to its best use. It is an established fact that one acre of soybeans will produce more butter fat than will two acres used for dairying. One man-hour of labor will produce 13.3 pounds of soybean oil compared with 1.5 pounds of butter fat.

I think the development of margarine has contributed much and will contribute much more to the health of the people in this Nation, because it brings a highly nutritive food to many who could not afford butter. It has been recommended before, and I want to recommend again, that the taxes and license fees be removed from margarine and the sale of margarine be encouraged. We are robbing some while we starve others just to protect the butter industry by taxation, and I want the people to know that the tax money has not amounted to a hill of beans. It no more than pays for enforcing the collection of the tax.

In conclusion, I should like to emphasize this point: I do not believe there is a single Member of the Congress who wants to destroy the butter industry. I do not believe any of the Members who have introduced bills for the repeal of the antimargarine laws want to hurt the dairy industry. It is my sincere belief that the repeal of these laws would be to the advantage of all farmers, including dairy farmers, and of the American people generally.

Much of the argument voiced in defense of the antimargarine laws has been based on an unproved assumption that without this discriminatory legislation, the dairy industry would be disrupted. There has been no proof submitted in Congress or elsewhere, so far as I am aware, to support this assumption. All the evidence I have seen—and I have studied this question carefully—abundantly proves the contrary.

On the other hand, it is clear that restrictions hamper and curtail the production and distribution of margarine and restrict those who produce the ingredients of margarine—more than 2,300,000 American farmers. As I have indicated, they are also restrictions upon the welfare of the great livestock industries of needy people at home and abroad and upon the best interests of the whole American people.

Mr. President, I hope that all Members of the Senate, regardless of party affiliation, will study the facts in this issue carefully and without prejudice. I am confident, if this is done, that there can be but one outcome; the antimargarine laws will be, at long last, removed from the statute books. If that be done, I believe the farmers, as well as the consumers, will be benefited thereby.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I have listened to the discussion of oleomargarine by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, who has just yielded the floor. I think he made a very effective argument from the standpoint of one representing his sectional interest and desirous of promoting the production of oleomargarine. I was, however, tremendously impressed by one statement which he made, to the effect that some persons like the taste of butter and some persons like the taste of oleomargarine. Those of us who are representing the dairy farmers and the majority of the farmers of America on this issue should like to keep the distinction clear between oleomargarine and butter, so that those who prefer the taste of butter may have butter, and those, to quote the Senator from South Carolina, who prefer the taste of oleomargarine, may have oleomargarine, and so that each may know what he is getting, so that each may know what is being served in restaurants and hotels, so that there may be no confusion or deception, so that a customer desiring butter may eat butter, and one who prefers oleomargarine may eat oleomargarine.

We accept that line of reasoning completely. Our legislation is based on that principle.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to withdraw my amendment lettered "D." It was offered both to the original bill and the substitute. I should like to explain my reasons for desiring to withdraw it. It is a very simple amendment which provides that all oleomargarine must be labeled in letters one-half inch high, "This is not a dairy product." I was not aware of the situation at the time I offered the amendment. My purpose was to prevent the fraud and deception now practiced. However, the Senator from New York [Mr. IVES] has handed me a telegram which is very convincing. It reads as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., January 9, 1950.

Hon. IRVIN M. IVES,
Senate Office Building:

Understand Senator McCARTHY proposes to require oleomargarine to be labeled "This is not a dairy product." Such labeling would mislead many Jewish people who observe the religious dietary laws. They would believe that vegetable oleomargarine contains no milk and therefore could be served and eaten with meat products. However, milk content of margarine forbids such use under kosher laws. On behalf of the Synagogue Council of America, representing the reform, conservative, and orthodox rabbis and congregations, I urge you to do all that you can to prevent any such misconception.

RABBI HERBERT S. GOLDSTEIN,
Chairman, Committee on Religious Observance, Synagogue Council of America.

Mr. President, in view of the fact that many brands of oleomargarine contain a very small percentage of dry skim milk, I can see that such labeling would be deceptive insofar as concerns persons who follow the orthodox Jewish faith. For that reason I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to withdraw the amendment. I shall prepare another amendment which will accomplish the desired results and, at the same time, be fair to the Jewish people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEAHY in the chair). The Chair inquires, is that amendment now before the Senate?

Mr. McCARTHY. It is now before the Senate.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. President, is that the second amendment, which says the product is not a dairy product?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It was not offered. It was merely presented to be printed and to lie on the table, was it not?

Mr. McCARTHY. It was offered to the Wiley-Gillette substitute, and I desire at this time to withdraw it from the Wiley-Gillette substitute.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I have no objection. I merely wanted to be clear as to what was done.

Mr. McCARTHY. Insofar as the bill of the Senator from Arkansas is concerned, the amendment merely has been printed and is lying on the table, and I said I was going to offer it to the Senator's bill also, but under the parliamentary rules I could not offer it at the time I presented it. It has been offered as an amendment to the Wiley-Gillette substitute, and my request now is that I be allowed to withdraw it as such.

Mr. MUNDT. It is an amendment offered to the proposed substitute, is it not?

Mr. McCARTHY. It is an amendment offered to the proposed Wiley-Gillette substitute.

Mr. MUNDT. And is not now a part of the proposed substitute?

Mr. McCARTHY. I think it may have been made a part of the substitute by unanimous consent. If so, I wish to withdraw it, and I have talked to as many of the sponsors of the substitute as I could contact, and there is no objection to my withdrawing it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the amendment has never been offered to the Wiley-Gillette substitute.

Mr. McCARTHY. I believe the Chair has made an error. I was here at the time it was offered, and the sponsors of the Wiley-Gillette substitute did accept the amendment at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that it was not accepted.

Mr. McCARTHY. If that is correct, may I have an understanding that it is withdrawn, if it was accepted, and is not now a part of the Gillette-Wiley substitute, so that it is not before the Senate at this time?

Mr. MUNDT. It does not appear in the language of the substitute in which we have all joined and which we offered together as a substitute for H. R. 2023.

Mr. McCARTHY. If that be true, then there was an unfortunate mistake on the part of the clerk, because the sponsors of the Wiley-Gillette substitute did accept it.

Mr. MUNDT. At least the Senator's explanation will certainly clarify the record, so that there will be no misunderstanding.

Mr. McCARTHY. I intend to prepare another amendment, which will call for substantially the same kind of provision, but will make it clear to those who are orthodox Jewish people that there is a small percentage of skim milk in the product, so that they will not be deceived.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield, while the Senator from Wisconsin is on the floor, so that I may call attention to amendment D offered by the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is not the amendment to which I am referring.

Mr. AIKEN. May I call attention to that at this time?

Mr. McCARTHY. Certainly.

Mr. AIKEN. The amendment is intended to prevent misrepresentation in the marketing of oleomargarine, and also to prevent misrepresenting it as being a product made from dairy fats.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. AIKEN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that his amendment does not provide a penalty, or at least an adequate penalty. The only penalty provided in it will be found in the Clayton Act, a $5,000 fine. If that fine is not paid for a year, it will amount to merely $5,000. I have had prepared an amendment to the Senator's amendment which reads as follows:

On page 2 of the amendment, between lines 18 and 19, insert the following new subsection:

"(c) Subsection (e) of section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: 'Each separate violation of such an order shall be a separate offense, except that in the case of a violation through continuing failure or neglect to obey a final order of the Commission each day of continuance of such failure or neglect shall be deemed a separate offense.'"

I wish the Senator from Wisconsin would take this amendment, look it over, and see if he cannot accept it as an amendment to his amendment, because it is apparent there must be provided some effective penalty against misbranding and misrepresentation, or the oleo interests would simply laugh.

Mr. MUNDT. The Senator's amendment would simply put teeth in the McCarthy amendment, would it not?

Mr. AIKEN. Yes, it would put teeth in the McCarthy amendment, and not only make violators liable to a $5,000 fine, but if they dragged the payment of the fine out over a year or a year and a half, the penalty would be $5,000 for each day they delayed paying the fine.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I think that is an excellent idea. I should have no objection whatsoever to accepting that modification of the amendment. I believe, however, the Senator said it would come between lines 18 and 19. I presume he meant between lines 20 and 21.

Mr. AIKEN. That is why I suggested that the Senator from Wisconsin look it over, to see that it is correct in detail.

Mr. McCARTHY. While I am very happy to accept the modification, in view of the fact that my amendment had already been accepted as a modification of the Wiley-Gillette amendment, I should want to talk to all the sponsors of the Wiley-Gillette amendment and see whether they objected to the modification.

Mr. AIKEN. In the event the Wiley-Gillette amendment is not accepted by the Senate, I understand that the Senator from Wisconsin intends to propose his amendment as an amendment to the bill itself, does he not?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes; and I understand that the Senator from Arkansas is at least very seriously considering the acceptance of this amendment to his original bill in case the Wiley-Gillette amendment shall not be accepted.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I am sorry I was not attending to the colloquy. What amendment is the Senator discussing?

Mr. McCARTHY. Amendment (E), which has to do with the fraudulent advertising of oleomargarine.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is the pending amendment?

Mr. McCARTHY. The pending amendment.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. When the time comes I shall consider discussing it with the Senator. I am inclined to think it is not too objectionable. There are one or two suggestions I desire to make when the proper time comes for voting on it. I may say that, generally speaking, it is not a very objectionable amendment, and it may well be we can agree on it.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I should like to suggest that we delay further debate on this matter until the time comes when the amendment is before the Senate. I yielded for the Senator from Wisconsin to secure unanimous consent and I hope the Senator will be willing to postpone further discussion.

Mr. McCARTHY. In calling this amendment to the attention of the Senator from Arkansas I wish to direct his notice to the fact that the amendment has been modified, so that there will be no objection.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I did not understand it had been modified. Has the amendment which is pending been modified?

Mr. McCARTHY. It has been modified by an amendment suggested by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. To provide a penalty, because it is obvious that the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin would not amount to much without a penalty provided.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. What I had to say a moment ago referred to the amendment before it was modified. Will it be printed as modified?

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I shall be glad to consider it. I do not know what the nature of the penalty is. There are already penalties provided in the Pure Food and Drugs Act.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, before the colloquy initiated by the Senator from Wisconsin became a part of the RECORD, I was pointing out that people who believe that butter has a right to the protection it now has under the present law need the protection they would get under the substitute which we have joined in offering. I concur completely in that major thesis developed by the Senator from South Carolina when he said that people who like butter better have a right to buy butter, and those who like oleomargarine better have a right to buy oleomargarine. I suggest that from those two facts there must come a third fact; namely, that each has the right to know what he is buying and what he is eating. We have proposed substitute legislation which protects him in that third right, which is just as important as either of the other two.

I also concur in another statement made by the Senator from South Carolina in his appealing discourse from the standpoint of the oleomargarine people, when he said that the housewives have no objection to using white oleomargarine for cooking purposes, but that the housewives insist that they want yellow oleomargarine for table use. Then he said that the American public has been accustomed to preferring a yellow table spread. Then he stopped and got away from what would be a logical sequence—how it happens that of all the colors of the spectrum, the American public has been accustomed to preferring yellow as a table spread. He knows what he did not say, so I say it for him, that the only reason in the world why the American public has become accustomed to preferring yellow as a table spread is because yellow is the color of butter, and people prefer butter. Many people presume that they are getting butter if they get something yellow on their bread. It is against that kind of dishonest delusion that we protest.

There are many other colors the oleomargarine producers could use. People in America do not object to using red as a table spread if the red is actually plum jelly, but they do not like to have foisted on them something colored red and tasting like oleomargarine, and appearing like plum jelly, because the manufacturers, apparently, cannot simulate the taste of plum jelly. Oleomargarine does imitate the taste of butter and the color of butter and the appearance of butter. There is a universal acceptance of butter as a preferred table spread, to such an extent even that, as the Senator from South Carolina said, for some strange reason the American public wants their table spread colored yellow, and that is the reason why those from the oleomargarine area want to enable the people to buy yellow oleomargarine.

Mr. President, for a long time during this debate, as I have heard it and read it, it has been hard for me to find out exactly why the Democratic Party put an oleomargarine plank in its national platform. It has been exceedingly difficult for me to know exactly why the Democrats have joined in these tragic days filled with many major problems in placing the repeal of the protection which the butter makers now enjoy against oleomargarine so high on the agenda and making that proposal an important must piece of legislation rather than considering some problem of real importance to our domestic or foreign situation. I have tried to analyze it objectively. I have tried to understand it because it seems to me important that we should understand it if we are to debate against the point of view and if we are to have a knowledge of the reasons why other people, whose judgments we respect, differ from us.

I think there are probably two major groups who are leading the battle against butter—two major groups who are leading the battle in behalf of the producers of oleomargarine. The first group, I think, is made up of Senators from the areas of America which produce an abundance of vegetable oil which the producers would like to convert into oleomargarine, and consequently those Senators feel that they will increase the prosperity and happiness of their section of the country if they can induce the American public, by hook or by crook, by color or without color, to use an additional amount of oleomargarine.

I think the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] falls into that category of support. I am sure the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] comes within that category. I am sure that many of the other Senators who have spoken for the oleomargarine-tax repealer, and who live in that area of the country, speak with that sort of understandable sincerity. But there are others on the Democratic side who joined in getting the oleo plank in the national platform, which was agreed to in a convention, who had a tremendous amount of difficulty in bringing together the points of view of the North and the South on anything else that was written into the Democratic platform. They agreed on this one point, however.

It seems to me that with respect to the other group or faction of the Democratic Party which does not come from a part of the country which produces oleomargarine, vegetable oil, the group which, in fact, in part, comes from a part of the country where they are trying to develop a dairy industry, we are confronted with just some plain, practical Pendergast politics which believes it can get some votes now by inducing some city people to go along with them, because they are going to give them a little cheaper spread, and they probably are not going to lose many votes among the farmers, because primarily they are dealing with a group of people who have had the good judgment to vote Republican anyway.

I may be wrong, but I am going to analyze this legislation as I go along, and see whether or not that is what has brought about this remarkably happy marriage between the two sections of the Democratic Party which disagreed so repeatedly and so heatedly on so many other issues at the party convention.

I think it can be demonstrated successfully that this proposal is not in the interest of the American farmer. It certainly is a proposal which is not going to increase his income. It is going to decrease it. I think that can be demonstrated from the arithmetic of the situation. The dairy industry is a rather important segment of the whole farm problem with which we have all been wrestling so industriously.

Our dairy herds account for about 22 percent of the agricultural income of the United States. That is nearly one-fourth of the whole farm income we are now concerned about. We are confronted with a direct attack upon 22 percent of the income of the farmers of America. The dairy business produces annually in the United States about $7,000,000,000 of income.

It has now been conclusively shown in statistical table after statistical table that the total income of America in any fiscal year is almost exactly 7 times the income from the farm. So we are tampering with an income not only of $7,000,000,000 which now accrues to the dairy farmers of America, but we are jeopardizing the pyramiding of that income, because when we reduce one factor in the formula of 7 times an important factor, of course we reduce the final answer obtained at the end of the operation of the formula. So we are dealing with a potential income of $50,000,000,000, because the $7,000,000,000 of it that the farmer gets from the dairying industry pyramids 7 times over, as does all other new real wealth produced in this country. So when we cut down by perhaps a $1,000,000,000 the income of the dairy farmer, we cut down by $7,000,000,000 the national income for a given year. No one has argued on any side of this question, up to now, that denying the dairy farmer this protection he has enjoyed for so long will increase his income. Everyone admits it will decrease his income. We argue, understandably, about the degree to which it will decrease it, but all admit it will decrease our national farm income.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I am very much interested in that argument. As the Senator knows, in the past 10 years 1,500,000 persons have left the farms of America. In the meanwhile the population of the United States has increased some 20-odd million persons. If the process of persons leaving the farms of America continues, for reasons such as we are talking about now, the result will be very evident that instead of getting cheaper prices we will have less and less foodstuffs, and the time may come, if soil of America is depleted by what is now proposed to be done, that we may become an importing nation. That is a very dangerous factor.

Mr. MUNDT. I think the Senator from Wisconsin places his finger on a very important problem, and that is the relationship of employment on the farm to the whole business involving the production of dairy products.

I should like to quote, as a further reply to what the Senator from Wisconsin has said, a portion of the statement I made at the time hearings were held on H. R. 2023 before the Senate Committee on Finance, in April of last year. On page 39 of those hearings, included in a part of my testimony on the subject, I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin, I had this to say:

> I would like to say just one word in emphasis of the very persuasive testimony of Senator THYE about the family-size farm, because in South Dakota the dairy industry is the industry of the family-size farm.

Understandably we have heard much from the Democratic side of the aisle about the family-size farm. But up to now the first legislative proposal dealing with the family-size farm is to deny it a considerable percentage of the income it now receives from the dairy industry.

I continue to read from my testimony:

> We have less than a thousand farms out there on which 50 percent of the effort is devoted to dairying. The dairying industry is part of the operation of the family-size farm. We are concerned, all of us, in maintaining a decent income for the family-size farmer, not only a good income but a steady income from which he has some cash resources and cash income through the year.

South Dakota and North Dakota are the two States of the Union which will be most drastically hurt by the proposed legislation, because they are the two States which derive the largest percentage of their farm income from dairy products insofar as the processing of milk is concerned. In our area the dairy farmer is the average-size farmer, operating the family-size farm. We have very few exclusive dairy farms in South Dakota. Less than 1,000 are exclusively devoted to dairying, but dairying forms a part of the farming operation of every family-size farmer, and it does not set well with the farmers of South Dakota when they listen to this Democratic attack on the family-size farmer for whom the Democrats have shed so many crocodile tears in so many past election years.

One way to do something for the family-size farmer is to protect him in the right he now has to extend his cash income, and project it throughout the year by enjoying a decent profit from his dairy-farm operations and from milking his cows and selling his butterfat.

I continue to read from my testimony:

> It has been figured, and I think accurately, that by permitting oleomargarine to be sold in direct competition, with no restriction, no restraint of trade and no tax, nothing except to let it try to seduce the housewife into buying it by making it appear to look like butter, making it taste like butter, giving it the melting consistency of butter, and everything else except the nutritive value of butter, would reduce the annual income to the American farmer by over $600,000,000 per year. This $600,000,000 is now going to farmers who are at the moment not getting the parity income of which Secretary Brannan talks. So we might find ourselves running into a situation where we would have to increase the Government purchases, the Government subsidy, or the Government support program, call it what you will, by over half a billion dollars if we destroy the revenue now going to the family-size farm from the butter industry.

So I say in response to the Senator from Wisconsin, it is highly important, if we believe in developing a family-size farm income, that we permit the milk operation and the selling of milk, and the selling of butterfats to be a part of the profitable practice of people living on family-size farms.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, while I was absent I understand that my associate, the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY], accepted an amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] to his amendment, and I understand that that particular amendment is as follows:

> Subsection (e) of section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence:
> "Each separate violation of such order shall be a separate offense, except that in the case of a violation through continuing failure or neglect to obey a final order of the Commission each day of continuance of such failure or neglect shall be deemed a separate offense."

Mr. President, when my associate submitted his amendment the other day I accepted it to the substitute in the nature of an amendment to the pending bill. I wish at this time to accept the modification as proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], so that in the amendment in the nature of a substitute we will have in it the original McCarthy amendment in what might be called this Aiken language to the McCarthy amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin will be further modified in accordance with his statement.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Dakota will yield further, I ask that the modification just made in the amendment in the nature of a substitute may be printed, so that it will be available tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, the action thus taken means that three acceptances have thus far been secured for the amendment. They await acceptance tomorrow on the part of the Senator from Arkansas.

If I may, I should like now to continue my remarks, rather than to deviate on the amendments.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask that this particular interchange or discussion appear in the RECORD at the conclusion of the Senator's remarks.

Mr. MUNDT. I object. Just let it appear at this point in the RECORD, so that the RECORD will be in orderly fashion; and I shall continue with my remarks now.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Do I correctly understand that the proposed Aiken amendment applies to any injunctive relief, as well as any criminal relief? Is that the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. WILEY. I shall let the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] answer that question. We have had a conference.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, not being a lawyer, I shall simply state that under the Federal Trade Commission law there is a fine of $5,000 for a violation.

Mr. MCCARTHY. The answer is "yes."

Mr. AIKEN. Since the junior Senator from Wisconsin says the answer is "Yes," I shall not continue, but shall let the Senator from South Dakota continue his remarks. He has been very patient.

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the Senator; that is quite all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin desire to have the amendment as modified printed?

Mr. MCCARTHY. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, continuing now in our search to try to find the underlying reasons motivating the introduction of this proposed legislation, and the fact that it has received such unanimity of support on the part of our Democratic colleagues, and the fact that it is a part of the Democratic political platform, upon which the Democrats ran successfully for office in the last election, I return to the position I have been attempting to establish, namely, that in the first instance this measure is not designed to help the farmer. Whatever else its purpose or whomever else it is expected to aid, it is not a piece of legislation which will be beneficial to the farmer. It has been developed thus far that it destroys a considerable segment of the farmers' income.

It goes further than that, Mr. President. We have in South Dakota and elsewhere in the Middle West, and I presume throughout the country generally, a very fine group of organizations known as farmers' cooperative creameries. Most of them are rather small establishments. I helped establish one in my home town. They belong to the farmers of the area, who bring in their butterfat or place it by the roadside and have it called for by the creamery truck. They patronize a particular creamery, and generally send to it all their milk or butterfat, and frequently through that creamery they develop a particular brand of butter. They hold their annual meetings, and distribute earnings at the end of the year. By that means the dairy farmers have been able to improve the grade of dairy cattle, and frequently to bring in calves, for instance, from Wisconsin and other areas to improve the dairy herds. Thus they have been able to establish a considerable development of dairying in areas where dairying is not particularly a major activity.

This measure will make it exceedingly difficult for those dairy farmers to compete with chain cream companies or to engage in the community effort by which they have been able to establish in the small towns and small cities of America a small locally owned and locally operated cooperative to help make dairying profitable to the farmers. So this measure, if enacted, will be of no value to them. It will turn the clock backward, so far as they are concerned.

Furthermore, it seems to me, Mr. President, that this proposal in the 1948 Democratic platform runs in direct conflict with a statement the President made in his address to the joint session of Congress a few days ago. It is merely one of a series of conflicts, incidentally, but it is one of those which is pertinent to this bill, because the President—quite rightfully, in my opinion—emphasized the importance of soil conservation, and referred to it several times in the course of his address to the National Congress. I now quote one or two sentences from what the President said in that connection, namely, that the gains America has made, referring to agriculture "cannot be achieved unless we have a stable and prosperous agriculture. They cannot be achieved unless we conserve and develop our natural resources in the public interest."

A little later he said—and I agree with him:

> If we are to achieve a better life for all, the natural resources of the country must be regarded as a public trust. We must use our precious assets of soil, water, forest, and grassland in such a way that they become constantly more productive and more valuable. Government investment in the conservation and development of our resources is necessary to the future economic expansion of the country.

Mr. President, here I call attention to the fact that the Chief Executive was referring to conservation of the soil and the water on the farms of America. Any student of agriculture must recognize, I believe, the relationship of dairying to soil conservation.

In continuing to quote authorities from the Chief Executive echelon of government, let me give as my authority, in refutation to the President's argument, the statement of Dr. Bennett, Chief of the United States Soil Conservation Service, who says that—

> Few, if any, other kinds of farms respond more promptly and satisfactorily to soil and water conservation, cropping, and pasture management measures than does dairy farming.

So we propose to show that this attempt in the Democratic platform and in the present move to affect injuriously the dairy industry by making it unprofitable, although the Chief of the Soil Conservation Service and others say that dairy farming is highly beneficial to soil conservation, comes at a time when the President calls upon the country to expand its soil-conservation efforts, not to decrease them.

So, Mr. President, aside from being grossly inconsistent with the position which any one party takes, the present move would tend to destroy, to decrease, to make unprofitable soil-conservation measures which are so essential to the future of this country.

O. E. Reed, Chief of the Bureau of Dairy Industry of the Department of Agriculture—still a part of the present administration, with its unique approach to these problems by arguing on each side of every issue—says:

> No farmer has a better opportunity to keep his farm land in a high state of fertility and productiveness than a man who markets his crops through good dairy cows.

So, Mr. President, in searching for the reason for the attempt to repeal the oleomargarine taxes, it certainly is not because it is going to reinforce the President's argument that we should have soil conservation, or the President's argument that we should produce greater prosperity among family-size farms and that we should give farmers an opportunity to work together cooperatively for their common welfare and their common good.

This measure surely is not a piece of proposed legislation which is devised to help the American taxpayer. I thought perhaps the tax feature of the measure was the reason why our good Democratic friends had finally gotten together upon an issue on which they could have almost complete agreement—one to help the taxpayer, because it would decrease, rather than increase, the tax revenue.

I think the Senator from South Carolina was correct when he said the present tax does not bring very much revenue into the Federal Treasury. I agree. However, regardless of whatever this measure will not bring, there is one thing that it will bring, when this change comes, and that will be a decrease, rather than an increase, in the revenue of the Treasury. But that is not the worst feature of this measure.

It comes at a time when we are committed—correctly, in my opinion—to a farm program which insists that there be a certain kind of floor support under major farm products, and when the Government has been purchasing butter in an effort to maintain at least some semblance of a reasonable price floor under butter, as the Government has been doing in the case of eggs, corn, wheat, and many other products. The Government has been doing that now for some considerable period of time, because the people of the United States have been unable to consume or have been unwilling to consume sufficient butter, or the producers have been making too much butter or the butter prices have fallen or something in our foreign policy has shaken them down. At all events, it has become essential for the Government to support butter prices, and the Government has been doing it to a rather considerable degree. About 12,000,000 pounds of butter a month are being purchased under the support price program. Interestingly enough, about 15,000,000 pounds of colored oleomargarine are being produced and sold in this country. So there is the basis for the present arrangement. If by legislative enactment we now further decrease the market for butter, by making it possible for oleomargarine to take over all or virtually all of that market, we shall thus make it necessary for the Government to increase its purchases of butter in order to support butter prices and that segment of our agriculture. I think the Government already has made an investment of approximately $100,000,000 in the butter-production program. But if we are going to drive the price of butter down by this move to change the taxes presently applying to oleomargarine and in respect to its packaging or color or labeling or the small print which says it is oleomargarine, then we are going to have to increase the Government's investment in the butter-purchasing program, and in that way the American taxpayer will find himself purchasing a great deal of extra butter, unless there is a purpose to throw the dairy farmers to the wolves altogether, pull the price floor from under the dairy farmers, or let it sag so low that it will be impossible for dairy farmers to produce butter at any reasonable margin of profit at all.

Let us search further. Why was it the Democratic National Convention made this attack on the dairy farmer? How did it happen? Whom are we going to help by this great program of getting together on the Democratic platform in order to fight a war against butter? How come this attack on the dairy farmer? How come they single out a product which throughout the Middle West means so much to the prosperity of the farmer, and which throughout the country contributes almost 25 percent of the total farm income?

I thought perhaps it was going to be of interest to the consumer; perhaps actually they are going to help the consumer; perhaps they are going to do something worth while for the consumer. So I made an investigation of it, to see how much the consumer would be helped by taking the 10-cent tax off colored oleomargarine. At first blush it looked as if it would be the quickest way possible to give him a table spread cheaper than he was previously getting. But I then realized, of course, that if the proponents of repeal were actually intending to help the consumer by trying to provide oleomargarine as a table spread to marginal families at a lower price, the place to have started was not with the 10-cent domestic tax but with the 22-cent foreign-import tax. The 22-cent tax could have been repealed if they were really trying to help the poor man, the little fellow, the consumer, the person with a small income, who understandably may want to buy oleomargarine because it is less expensive for his family. The place to do him a really good turn would have been to recommend, not the repeal of the 10-cents-a-pound tax, but the repeal of the 22-cents-per-pound import tax on oleomargarine. That would have given him some real relief, more than twice the relief he would get under this bill, and it would not have thrown the American dairy farmer into direct and unfair competition with the oleomargarine trust.

I may come around a little later to the reason why I think they did not do that. I think it will become clear, when I discuss the reasons for this marriage between the South, which understandably has an economic reason for trying to get the people to use oleomargarine, and the cities of the North, which joined the South in an agreement in the national Democratic convention on a platform plank against the farmer on which there could be unanimity. I think there is reason for it, which I shall come to a little later, which falls under the heading of practical political Pendergastian-type politics, which tries to get votes from one section of the country by doing an injury to people of another section. But anyway, the bill will not reduce the cost of the cheap table spread to the extent it could have been reduced if they had wanted to, because they could have repealed the 22-cent tax instead of the 10-cent tax. Actually the records show that those who buy oleomargarine because it is cheaper, or because, as the Senator from South Carolina says, some people like its taste better, will have to pay more for their oleomargarine, after the Fulbright bill is passed, if it is passed, than they do now. That is demonstrated by the record, because in areas where colored oleomargarine is sold, it sells at almost the price of butter, just enough under it to provide an unfair kind of scab competition against butter, since it sells sometimes as much as 25 and 30 cents a pound higher than uncolored oleomargarine. So the oleo interests will have eliminated the competition which colored oleomargarine now has with uncolored oleomargarine, thus enabling them to raise considerably, the average prices of oleomargarine throughout the country, making the marginal family pay considerably more for its table spread than it pays today, and putting additional lush profits into the coffers of the international oleomargarine cartel. But it is not going to be of any concern to the consumer, so far as helping him is concerned.

How about the little fellow? I have heard from Democratic spokesmen since I have been in Washington for 11 years, so many tear-jerking stories about the little fellow, I thought, "Ha, ha." At last they have found something which is going to help the little fellow, and that is why everyone got together in the happy environment of Philadelphia and agreed, "Here is a Democratic platform on which we can all concur." So I looked around to see who was making the oleomargarine. I thought certainly I should find oleomargarine being fabricated or processed or manufactured or concocted—however oleomargarine is made—by many small producers in small towns operating small oleomargarine plants. Certainly I thought I should find many farmers' co-ops making oleomargarine, because no one has shed more tears for farmers' co-ops than has the Democratic Party, or done less to enable them to enjoy a good economic environment in which to function. But I searched in vain for that, Mr. President. I found that oleomargarine was not being made by little fellows anywhere, that there were no small local, home-town organizations making it; there were no small independents, of whom we heard so much in the President's message: "Give us more small independent-business men." I could not find any of them making oleomargarine. I could not find any farmers' co-ops making oleomargarine. I found that oleomargarine production was about as tight, about as tough, and about as gigantic, an international monopoly and cartel as could be discovered anywhere under the canopy of heaven. So that actually, whom we propose to help fundamentally is a tremendously strong and tight international cartel, owned in large part by foreign capital. And to help those friends of monopoly the farmers of America are expected to lose any right to have a legitimate margin of profit in selling their dairy products.

That sounds like a strong statement. Let us see what the facts are which support it. Let us talk about the dairy farmer first, because he is a little fellow who has for years been trying to develop for himself a family-size farm with a diversity of activity from which he can have a stable and continuing farm income. About 10,000,000 Americans are dependent upon the dairy industry for their livelihood. That is a large number of Americans. There are more than 3,500 creameries, many of them, as I say, small, locally owned creameries, many of them small creameries owned locally by farm cooperatives. They are distributed in all the 48 States, most of them north of the Mason and Dixon's line, but many of them in the South, where they are at long last recognizing the importance of diversified farming and increasing the size and scope of the dairy industry throughout Dixie. I think it is a step of progress from the standpoint of the agricultural pattern of the South. We have found out then who produces the butter, who processes it. It is the little fellow.

Who does the oleomargarine business in this country? There are only 26 plants altogether. As contrasted with 3,500 creameries, most of them locally owned, there are 26 oleomargarine plants, none of them little fellows, all of them in direct competition with the farmer on his farm. But five of them have gotten together and produced 64.8 percent of all the oleo made in this country. One of these is Lever Bros., a subsidiary of Unilever, Ltd., of London. This company produces 40 percent of the oleo in the world. One company, one cartel, one international group of monopolists produces 40 percent of the oleomargarine in the world, and a considerably larger percentage of that used here in the United States. They are now completing in this country a new plant for the purpose of utilizing, if the proposed legislation succeeds, not cottonseed oil, not the fine vegetable oils about which our friends in the South are understandably concerned, but coconut oil, which is imported from abroad, which is now protected by a 6 cents a pound levy; because the South, which does not want the dairy interest to have any protection against oleomargarine, insists that it have protection against vegetable oils shipped in from abroad. In other words, this is not an argument which says, "What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander." It is an argument which says, "Here is our chance to pluck the dairy farmer of the North," because they insist on that protection. But if it disappears, then coconut oil can be used much more inexpensively in the manufacture of oleomargarine, as the Oleomargarine Trust well knows, than can the vegetable oils of the United States and the southern section of the country. So, Mr. President, it will be found that we shall have turned over completely to the international cartel and to the international producers the manufacturing of low-cost table spreads for America.

No; it certainly was not the little fellow they were trying to help. I was tremendously impressed by the recital yesterday by our colleague from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] about who would really get the greatest help in this program. There certainly can be no question that Lever Bros. will be the largest beneficiary, and that organization is one of the big cartels of the world, one of the great monopolies, one of those joining with four other companies in having a virtual monopoly of the oleomargarine business of this country. They are going to be the largest beneficiary.

But they do not lack gratitude, Mr. President. The president of this group for the United States, Mr. Charles Luckman, believes in scratching the backs of people who scratch his. He does not simply accept favors, say, "Thank you," and go home. As we all know, he has accepted the national chairmanship of the "Jefferson-Jackson Day oleomargarine dinners" which are to be held sometime next month, as I understand. It will be the only time in our history when oleomargarine dinners will cost $100 a plate. So this oleomargarine king, Charley Luckman, has been given by the Democratic National Committee the duty of organizing the dinners and shanghaiing the people to pay $100 a plate so they can hear speeches about the patron saints of democracy and the benefits of oleomargarine as a table spread. Luckman receives the benefit of the oleomargarine angle, and the people who attend the dinners will receive the benefit of political speeches. I hope oleomargarine will be served instead of butter. I think that would be consistent. This law of diminishing returns should be applied to the political product of this country.

Last night, when I heard that Charley Luckman was going to be the recipient of this great favor which is about to be bestowed upon him by the action of the Democratic National Committee, I thought he was going to raise all the money and have all this whoopla to keep everyone happy, since his trust had had dropped into its lap one of the richest financial plums to come to any monopoly in the history of America, because it will enable him to increase the price of oleomargarine of every color, to increase the price of the poor man's table spread, and, at the same time, prevent competition.

I suppose Charley Luckman has some ideas of his own as to what will be served at the dinners, which are $100 propositions. I am only a country boy from South Dakota. I do not know what a $100 dinner tastes like. I let my imagination have full swing, and this is what I think should be the menu:

Of course the donkey emblem of the party will be there. I suppose they will put the donkey emblem on one side and an oleomargarine package on the other side. That would keep the thing in balance, because I think Luckman is entitled to all the advertising he can get from these dinners for the benefit of the Oleomargarine Trust. There will be some liquid refreshments, of course, and since they have set the pattern of specializing in things foreign, I presume they will start out with some Scotch from Scotland and champagne from France. They can import oleomargarine from any 1 of 40 different countries and still pay tribute to Luckman and Lever Bros. The caviar, of course, will come from Russia. I can think of other reasons why they might want to import something from Russia, but I will limit it to the suggestion that they will get their caviar from Russia because it would not be exactly fair to have an oleomargarine dinner publicizing a victory over American-made butter, and then have other American-made products on the table.

The meat course will be Argentine beef. They will hear much at the dinner about F. D. R., for he is one of the patron saints of the party. I hope, among other things, they will remember that he was the man who said that Argentine beef was cheaper and infinitely better than American beef. So, since they will have oleomargarine, which, according to the Democratic position, is infinitely cheaper and better than American butter, they will have Argentine beef which is infinitely cheaper and better, according to F. D. R., than American beef.

For dessert I suppose there will be plum pudding from England. There will be coffee and nuts from Brazil and cigars from Cuba. Then we shall indeed have a Jefferson-Jackson Day oleomargarine dinner at which neither the American producer nor taxpayer can expect to get a fair break.

I do not know what other reason the Democrats could have for picking out Charley Luckman, because, after all, he will have a great debt to pay the Democratic Party if this proposed legislation is enacted into law.

It is not in the interest of the United States, I think, to pass this bill. It would turn over to too many foreign groups, too many foreign cartels, the right to profit from table spreads, and drive domestic butter out of competition for the enjoyment of the housewife, subjecting her to unfair competition by a product colored and packaged in order to deceive the housewife into thinking she is actually buying butter.

I think, Mr. President—and this is my final position—that it is not in an effort to keep in compliance with American tradition and custom of fair play, decency, and honesty, that the oleomargarine plank of the Democratic national platform is foisted upon us. It is not in conformity with American commercial practice. In this country we have recognized for years copyright privileges. When a person writes a story, a song, or a play, he has a right, because he has developed the particular product, to enjoy a reasonable benefit from it. I hope we shall continue that practice. I should hate to see something which is rightfully extended to playwrights, singers, and authors denied to farmers who have spent generations publicizing the color of butter as a table spread to such an extent that a Senator from the oleo region, who preceded me in this debate, said that for some reason or other the housewives of America want to color their table spreads yellow. The obvious reason, of course, is that yellow is the color of butter.

If a mechanic invents a device he is permitted to profit by the invention. A few of the more ardent New Dealers have been trying to remove that right. Thus far a sufficient number of Americans agree that it is pretty good sportsmanship, and pretty wise business to issue patents for inventions. So we still have the patent privilege in this country. If a man schemes out a way to do some particular thing, he can get a patent on his invention.

The farmers have found a way to make a table spread. They have developed a product of a certain shape, size, melting consistency, and color, served in a certain style. The oleomargarine trust, with Charley Luckman riding at its head, wants to destroy that particular product which the American farmer has perfected. That is not in conformity with the American concept of fair play. It may be smart politics. It may attract a few deluded voters in the cities at the cost of the American farmer, but it is not in conformity with the American concept of fair play. It is denying to the farmer that which we rightfully extend to the author, the playwright, and the mechanic. We also extend it to business. We even extend to Charley Luckman's oleomargarine trust the right to protect a certain brand name for a certain type of oleomargarine against the competition of a poor local businessman or a group of farmers who may want to make oleomargarine in competition with the monopoly and the international cartel. We deny the new producer of oleomargarine, and, in my opinion, rightfully so, the right to take Charley Luckman's name, his brand, his label, his motto, his description, or his fictitious formula of nutrition values. We protect the monopoly against the small independent competitor in that connection, because there is a copyright law which applies. That is the American system. But butter has had to rely upon a color and consistency and upon being served in little butter plates in hotels and restaurants, according to a custom which has developed over a long period of time. By the tradition of exclusive usage, butter has that right, and Charley Luckman's international cartel has no right to destroy it.

Mr. President, I shall be disappointed in the Senate if, because of plain political chicanery, it allows this bill to be passed, because, in the final analysis, even the consumer in the city will pay more for his table spread, once we take colored oleomargarine out of competition with white oleomargarine. The difference in the price will hurt the people who are presumed to be helped.

Let me say in conclusion, Mr. President, that I think the Senate should adopt the substitute amendment, in which a number of us join, in an effort to provide some degree of satisfaction to our good friends in the South, who feel that, for some reason or other, oleomargarine is being hampered by the present 10-percent tax. Moreover, we have inserted another protective provision which will meet the principles involved. We continue to give butter an opportunity, within the boundaries of its own State, to enjoy whatever advantage the citizens of the State may suggest.

We provide, in connection with that, repeal of other excise taxes. To me one of the most glaring demonstrations of the purely political conception of this legislation, Mr. President, is that it singles out one excise tax, the tax on oleomargarine, and says, "We are going to eliminate that," and says nothing about all the other excise taxes in which all the other citizens are interested, which pyramid the living cost for all the families using oleomargarine and all the families rejecting oleomargarine.

If we wish to be consistent, we must give the Members of the Senate a chance to vote a very consistent point of view, because we have added as a proposed amendment an excise tax repealer which includes the repeal of the excise tax on oleomargarine, and includes, in addition, repeal or reduction to a prewar level of the excise taxes on the other articles on which the public is now paying excise taxes—not merely oleomargarine, but all the other things, such as furs, toilet preparations, telegraph and telephone, and radio and cable facilities; the tax on jewelry, electric light bulbs, and tubes; the tax on women's purses, and the tax on admissions; as well as other taxes which certainly take more out of the taxpayer's pocket than the 10-cent-a-pound tax on oleomargarine.

If that is logic, there will be a chance to vote for that kind of legislation, which will provide a still fairer basis of economic cooperation between the butter producer and the oleomargarine producer, and at the same time give genuine relief to the American taxpayer clear across the board.

Mr. President, I hope the substitute will be adopted. If the substitute is not adopted, then I hope that the Senate will reject the Fulbright bill, H. R. 2023, and defeat this unconscionable effort to increase the already rich profits of the oleomargarine trust at the expense of the American farmer. If we can induce enough of our Democratic friends to come along and do that, and if because they have left his ship of state—Charley Luckman refuses to head up the Jefferson-Jackson Day oleomargarine dinners, we shall try to find them a good Republican leader for the patriotic dinner, and provide free tabs of butter so that they may have a good American feast.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I expect to suggest the absence of a quorum, but before I do so I wish to compliment the distinguished Senator from South Dakota and I wish to add one little item in relation to what he spoke of as to what might be called the common-law copyright in color.

It is a strange thing that the Yellow Cab Co. can go into the courts, and has done so, restraining competitors from using the color yellow on their cabs; it is a strange thing that Mr. Luckman's company can go into the courts and restrain the use of the red color in soap, and get protection; it is a strange thing that this common-law copyright has been used under the circumstances so dynamically and forcefully outlined by the distinguished Senator from South Dakota and, at the same time, the farmer can be sold down the river, which is what will happen if the Senate refuses to take appropriate action by rejecting the bill.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). A quorum is present.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I rise to speak in support of the substitute amendment to H. R. 2023, which is known as the Wiley-Gillette amendment and which I have the pleasure of cosponsoring along with 25 other Senators from both sides of the aisle.

In view of all the verbiage which has surrounded this issue, it may be well to restate now what the substitute amendment provides.

It removes all Federal taxes and license fees in the sale of oleomargarine. It prohibits the movement of yellow oleomargarine in interstate commerce. It makes no change in the applicability of the pure food and drug laws. It permits the States to take any further steps they may consider necessary, in accordance with their own interests or desires, to regulate the production and sale of colored oleomargarine.

Mr. President, it does in fact preserve States' rights in this field. All of us know, and it is all too true, that today States' rights are disappearing in many fields; but it appears that this is one field in which we would do well to preserve States' rights.

It is also proposed to revise the Wiley-Gillette amendment so as to incorporate a provision for the repeal of the wartime excise taxes imposed by the Revenue Act of 1943 on jewelry, furs, toilet preparations, electric light bulbs and tubes, communications, transportation of persons, theater admissions, and so forth. The revision also contemplates a repeal of the retail tax on luggage, restoring the former manufacturer's tax instead; and it would reduce the tax on photographic supplies, including films, to a uniform 10 percent.

The able senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] has also taken as part of his amendment the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY], which prohibits certain advertising and certain other things which should be considered fraudulent.

There is, I am sure, a prevailing sentiment throughout the country for the removal or reduction of these excise taxes.

Like the oleomargarine tax, they were imposed for regulatory purposes. They were imposed during the war to discourage the manufacture and sale of certain commodities and services. During the war the Government saw fit to levy the excise taxes in order that the people would not buy, and thus the manufacture of goods of a luxury nature would be discouraged, and in that way industry could devote itself to the principal job of producing the necessities of life, as they were considered in wartime, and also war munitions. As regulatory prohibitions, those excise taxes were purely of an emergency nature. No matter how attractive their revenue features, they have no place in a peace-time economy.

I think it wholly appropriate that this additional provision for the repeal of excise taxes be included in the amendment, in connection with the repeal of another excise tax—that on oleomargarine.

Mr. President, two interests are involved in this controversy. They are essentially the interests which are involved in every economic issue, namely, those of the producer and those of the consumer. In what I shall say at this time, I shall not cover the subject which was so thoroughly covered earlier today by the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], when he discussed the question of monopoly and cartel. He analyzed that phase of the question, and I think he demonstrated very clearly that the small manufacturer and the small-business man receive lip service and the crumbs which fall from the table, but the monopoly and the oleo cartel get the dollars and the banquet.

The Senator from South Dakota told us today what he believed to be the proper designation of the menu, when he referred to the oleo dinners which are about to be had at $100 a plate. I am surprised that he did not also say that, at the end of the meal, those who partake of those dinners would find in their finger bowls, not the ordinary rose petals, but soap bubbles, probably from Lifebuoy, which would prevent any odor of what had happened as a result of the activities of this cartel, and also, perhaps, Lux bubbles, so that no one would shrink from the protection being given to the cartel.

Mr. President, it seems to me perfectly certain that the interests of the consumer are involved in the oleomargarine issue. The consumer is entitled to obtain oleomargarine, if it is his preference, without the imposition of arbitrary, discriminatory Federal taxes. I believe that the consumer likewise is entitled to protection by the Federal Government from any fraudulent substitution of oleomargarine for butter, should butter be the consumer's choice. I take it that there is no dispute that in every way possible the manufacturers of olemargarine have sought to imitate the qualities and characteristics of butter. Imitation is flattery, but it may be carried to the point of serious invasion of proprietary rights, in the form of unfair competition, as well as an invasion of the right of personal preference. That proposition has been consistently maintained by our courts and, as a matter of fact, is the basis of the legislative precedent for the pending substitute amendment.

The proposed substitute amendment is patterned after the Federal Filled Milk Act of 1923, which prohibits the shipment of filled milk in interstate commerce. Filled milk is an imitation product resembling evaporated milk. It is a product in which vegetable oils have been substituted for the butterfat found in pure evaporated milk, just as oleomargarine is a product in which vegetable fats and oils are substituted for the butterfat of pure butter.

The Supreme Court has twice upheld the constitutionality of the Filled Milk Act, and in a 1944 case the Court pointed out that filled milk compounds lend themselves readily to substitution for or confusion with milk products and that they are artificial or manufactured foods which are cheaper to produce than similar whole milk products. The Court said:

> When compounded and canned, whether enriched or not, they are indistinguishable by the ordinary consumer from processed natural milk. * * * The possibility and actuality of confusion, deception, and substitution was appraised by Congress. The prevention of such practices or dangers through control of shipments in interstate commerce is within the power of Congress.

Mr. President, that is exactly what we have before us today, namely, the question of whether Congress should say that in the present case the possibility and probability of fraud should be stopped at the State line. If we consider the Filled Milk case, about which the Supreme Court was talking, and if we then substitute the phrase "possibility and actuality of confusion, deception, and substitution" in the case of the substitution of oleomargarine for butter, we shall have the reasons for the proposed amendment, which is submitted in the exercise of the Federal Government's authority to protect the consumer against possible fraud.

The exercise of governmental authority to prevent the "possibility and actualityof confusion, deception," and substitution at the expense of the consumer does not prevent the consumer from exercising his preference, if he has one, for an adequately identified butter substitute. On the other hand, it is obviously desirable that the producer of butter shall have a fair opportunity to manufacture and market his product; and the amendment in the nature of a substitute is no more than a minimum step in that direction.

Mr. President, it is a well-known fact that the States cannot act in the same fields of law in which the Federal Congress has jurisdiction and in which the Congress acts—such as the field of interstate commerce. This amendment is no more nor less than a declaration of policy, a declaration that Congress is not acting in the field which is reserved to the States in their home territory in relation to colored oleomargarine or insofar as the protection of its citizens from fraud is concerned. Therefore, it is proper to permit States' rights to function in this field, under the police power of the States, to determine how the citizens of the States should be protected from fraud. I am gravely concerned about the consequences, should that element of fair competition not be preserved. I fear greatly for the consequent impact upon the economy of this country.

My own State is vitally affected. Michigan is rightly noted throughout the world for its automobiles and its industrial products. But agriculture is equally the strength of the State's economy. We rank among the first eight States, I believe, in our agricultural product; dairying represents over 40 percent of Michigan farm income.

The inroads upon agriculture of unfair colored oleomargarine competition with butter have been terrific. Farmers receive 75 percent of the consumer's butter dollar. The oleo manufacturer's margins are tremendous and cut down the farmer's share of the oleo dollar to about 30 percent. Farmers receive 50 cents per pound for butter and less than 8 cents per pound for oleo. For each pound of oleo sold to replace butter, the income to dairy farmers is cut 42 cents. That is why we must consider whether we are fostering and helping monopoly, rather than the small farmer, if we enact the bill which is now pending. In this particular field, the farmer's wife who has one cow or a few cows must be considered a manufacturer, when she is producing butter in competition with the trusts which produce oleomargarine. That is true because the oils and fat that go into oleo are produced under certain processing conditions. Butterfat is obtained from the milk of the cow.

I am told that Michigan farmers are losing $26,500,000 a year at the present time due to the substitution of oleo for butter. It is a staggering inroad, which could be justified only if the competition between the two products were absolutely fair. Those inroads are not confined alone to dairy incomes. The economic ramifications are endless.

Mr. President, the farmers of the United States have been able to conserve land, they have been able to obtain a better income, and to enjoy better economic conditions than have the farmers of other lands, because of the dairy cow. As one travels, he finds that the number of cows in America compared to the number in other countries is much greater. We see them all over the landscape, throughout our country. They have been of real economic aid to America's standard of living. I could not help but realize, as I saw the lack of dairy cows in other lands, that the dairy cow is used in America, and was used originally as the only fertilizer so far as farms were concerned; but with the development of chemical fertilizers, naturally many persons think the cow has no place in this field. I should like to relate to the Senate my experiences in visiting a farm in Iran recently. A former Premier took me out one morning to see what he said was the building of a farm. He was taking the top soil from the sides of the hills, digging it up to a depth of 3 feet, removing the larger stones and boulders, and taking the finer gravel for the top surface. It was then necessary for him to go down into the earth to get water. He had to dig holes and finally locate a stream, and then follow the stream until he could bring the water to the surface. It was hard work, as it was to obtain soil. He then said he would like to take me down to a place where he raised chickens, pigeons, ducks, and geese. I asked him about his income from their meat and eggs. He said, "That is not at all the purpose in having these pigeons, chickens, geese, and ducks. I keep them solely to fertilize the land." That showed how important it was to have fertilizer on the farm. It brought back to my mind the days when, here in America, we had only the animals on the farms as a means of fertilizing the land. The same thing was brought forcefully to my attention in Siam, where all the farming is done by hand. There we saw black fertilizer being thrown on the embankment which had been made. When we inquired the nature of the fertilizer, we were told it was the fertilizer from bats which had come from caves in the mountains several hundred miles distant. It again showed me the importance of fertilizer to farm land.

But as I was saying, the economic ramifications are endless. Since 1944 we have lost more than 2,840,000 of our milk-cow population in this country, over 890,000 of them in 1948. This depletion of dairy herds has coincided exactly with the increase in the unrestricted manufacture and distribution of yellow-colored oleomargarine.

The implications of that depletion are felt not just by the 2,500,000 dairy farmers in this country to whom it represents a decline in income. It is felt by all the 10,000,000 people in this country who derive their living from the dairy industry through the processing of dairy products, and by the countless others whose services and products, such as feed and farm equipment, are purchased by the dairy industry.

Just to illustrate that point, I am reminded of one experience in the utilization of agricultural products, which is recognized as so essential to the national economy. Michigan, as you may know, is one of the great sugar-beet producers of the country. It is a foremost agricultural product of the State. For many years the processing of sugar beets entailed a great wastage in pulp, which was dumped into rivers and streams until their pollution became a serious conservation problem. Because of its nature it could not be dumped in the open. Its disposal was a major problem in the sugar-beet industry.

Then Mr. Laroe, a Michigan feed merchant, who had traveled in Europe and observed there a means of processing the pulp as dairy feed, went to the beet-sugar manufacturers with a proposition. "How much will you charge to take this stuff away?" they asked him. "Charge you nothing," he replied, "I'll pay you for it." And so the value of the sugar-beet product in Michigan was increased immensely as its processed pulp found an abundant market among the herdsmen of the country.

The same may be said of brewers' grain, and many other such products. Where will the market go if the dairy herds continue to diminish?

Where will a market be found for vegetable crops, such as soybean, linseed, and cottonseed meal if our milk-cow herds disappear?

Although less capable of immediate observation, an even more important consideration in the stripping of dairying as an agricultural activity is its effect on soil conservation. Food production, and its distribution, is the great problem of the human race. Hanging over the race is the knowledge, in the greater part of the United States, that only 6 inches of topsoil separates it from starvation. The United States Government is spending millions of dollars on soil conservation, and today we find ourselves considering the passage of conflicting legislation, apparently its effect on the millions of dollars we are disbursing in order to conserve the soil of America.

The conservation of our natural resources and the soil in particular is a major concern for every one of us. Any farm economist can testify that it is impossible to maintain a proper soil conservation while reducing our livestock population.

For once, I have had occasion to agree with Secretary of Agriculture Brannan when he wrote in an article for Country Gentleman:

> Sometimes we have the good fortune to be in a position where the things we want to do are the things we ought to do. That's the way it is now with agriculture. The major change we ought to make in our agricultural pattern is to increase livestock numbers and the acreage of soil-conserving grasses and legumes to support them. That would be good for the land, good for consumers, and good for farmers. In fact, the economic stability of a large part of American agriculture, before another decade ends, may depend upon a big enough increase in livestock numbers to eat what otherwise may be surplus grain, and enough dollars in the pockets of city consumers to buy the resulting increase of meat and dairy products. At the same time, increased emphasis on soil conservation will be necessary in order to make sure that production will be adequate in the more distant future.

Every year a dairy farm becomes more productive, more valuable in promoting the natural wealth to the country. A grass farm is wholly resistant to erosion. On the other hand, the crops which will be substituted for pasture in the production of vegetable oils for oleo are among the worst of the soil depleters.

The effect of the depletion of dairy herds will be felt by the food consumer. Almost 75 percent of the veal which is sold in American butcher shops comes from dairy herds and a full quarter of the medium-grade beef. Where will these popular meat dishes be supplied if the dairy herds are depleted, and what will happen then to the price of meat?

Mr. President, it is the purpose of those who manufacture oleo to put the producers of butter out of business. They would prevent the production of a pound of butter. In this war against the monopolies let us not think that the 35 oleo manufacturers in the United States will not enter this field with a determination to monopolize it entirely. That is the purpose of removing the 10-cent tax on oleo. The purpose will also be to remove the 22-cent importation tax, and then an effort will be made to put butter out of business.

Mr. President, these are major considerations for every one of us in considering the present legislation. They rest on the proposition that dairying, which depends upon butter production for its stability, must inevitably suffer tremendously if butter is not given minimum protection in its competitive position with oleomargarine. That minimum protection is to prevent fraud and deception of the persons who consume it.

There are other considerations which bear noting. For one thing, I am satisfied that the low cost of oleomargarine as a substitute for butter, which is held out as being so attractive to the consumer, is largely illusory. It is cheap today because it must compete with butter for favor. Let it retain that price advantage for a while, and through its unregulated production largely remove butter from the market. Then watch the cartels which are behind oleo production seize their opportunity to skyrocket its price. Combine that result with all the other economic implications of a decline in the dairying industry, and then measure the result. It will be only a loss.

This is not a field in which small businesses will ever become a dominant factor. Small business will never be engaged in the manufacture of oleo. It does not lend itself to small business.

Mr. President, the substitute amendment seeks merely to forestall these consequences and many other implications.

It seeks to do so by placing the weight of the Federal Government behind the consumer's right to protection against fraud in his freedom of choice.

It seeks to acknowledge butter's request for a fair competitive position.

It leaves to the States any exceptions they may wish to make in the exercise of their inherent regulatory powers.

Mr. President, I am informed that the bill, without the substitute amendment, would require $95,000,000 in order properly to carry out its intent, and provide necessary regulations and enforcement. If the amendment be adopted the States alone will be responsible for regulation, so far as fraud is concerned. We are leaving to the people of the States the determination of what they desire to do in their particular States.

I hope that the far-seeing Members of this body, concerned with the interests of both producer and consumer and the national economy as a whole, will support the substitute amendment.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in order to make some progress, I am wondering whether the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, who is in charge of the bill, will consider accepting the so-called McCarthy amendment and taking it to conference. That would remove one amendment out of the way.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I will say to the distinguished majority leader that the McCarthy amendment is not objectionable to us. The only question is the phraseology of one portion of it, which seems to me to be too expensive in its application. I am disposed, with the agreement of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], who is quite familiar with the situation, to take the amendment to conference with the thought that the language which I think is too extensive may be properly limited. I do not think it is a serious defect. It is merely a matter of drafting. I think the remainder of the amendment is acceptable. We have never contended that we wanted oleomargarine to be disguised and presented as butter. The Aiken amendment which was offered this morning is a strengthening amendment, and my understanding is that the Senator from Vermont felt it offered a better safeguard against the objections. So, Mr. President, I am disposed to accept the McCarthy amendment and take it to conference.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator from Arkansas for accepting the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin as modified by the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. LUCAS. That ends it, of course, Mr. President, but I still wish to make the statement which I started to make. I do not think I was taken off my feet by the distinguished Senator who now occupies the chair when he put the question before I had an opportunity to say anything with reference to it. I merely want to compliment the Senator from Arkansas for accepting the amendment, because I agree with him with respect to the identification of margarine. The amendment is not in opposition to the position of the Senators who favor the bill.

A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LUCAS. What is the next amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the substitute amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] on behalf of himself and other Senators, subject, of course, to the right of any Senator to offer perfecting amendments either to the substitute amendment or to the original bill.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LANGER. I have various amendments printed and lying on the table. In the natural course of events would my amendments come up for consideration before the other amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota has offered amendments. If amendments are offered to the original bill they would be voted upon before the substitute amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin would be voted upon.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LUCAS. In the event the substitute amendment should be adopted, what would be the position of the amendments with respect to civil rights offered by the Senator from North Dakota?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the substitute is agreed to, no further amendment would be in order.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think no further amendment will be offered to the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the substitute is rejected, then the original bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, my understanding is that the Senate accepted the McCarthy-Aiken amendment to the original bill. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment was agreed to by action of the Senate.

Mr. WILEY. Did it include the Aiken amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It included the Aiken amendment. It was the McCarthy amendment as modified by the Aiken amendment.

NOMINATIONS REPORTED

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, from the Committee on Armed Services, I report the following nominations for the Executive Calendar:

Hubert E. Howard, to be Chairman of the Munitions Board; John F. Floberg, to be Assistant Secretary of the Navy; Maj. Gen. James H. Burns, United States Army, to be Assistant Secretary of Defense; and Adm. Forrest P. Sherman, United States Navy, to be Chief of Naval Operations.

I ask that the civilian nominations go to the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The civilian nominations will be placed on the calendar.

NOMINATION OF CHIEF OF NAVAL OPERATIONS

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, as in executive session, that the nomination of Admiral Forrest P. Sherman, to be Chief of Naval Operations, be confirmed and that the President be notified. I make the request for the reason that there has been no confirmed Chief of Naval Operations since last August. The committee has had full and extensive hearings on the nomination, and the report was unanimous, accompanied by the prayer that the nomination might be considered immediately, in view of the national defense. I hope this one nomination, which comes unanimously from the committee, may be confirmed and the President may be notified.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, very reluctantly, I am obliged to object. There are only a dozen Senators on the floor. I shall have no objection when the nomination comes to the floor in its regular course, but I think that when we are considering another measure we should not interrupt the debate to bring up a matter of this kind.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, if I may make rejoinder to the distinguished Senator from North Dakota, I suggest to him that the committee has gone into this matter fully, and if it did not come from the committee unanimously, with the full committee present, the Senator from Maryland would not make the request. The committee is a very able one, and because this post has been only semiofficial since last August, and because the Senator from Maryland realizes the implications of the national defense, he thought that this one nomination of the Chief of Naval Operations, in view of the unanimous report of the committee, and the long time the appointment has been in abeyance might be confirmed and the President notified at once, solely in the interest of national defense. I hope my good friend from North Dakota will make an exception in this case, because this is not a political appointment; it is routine, and the officer is a very important part of our national-defense machinery. The other nominations I am perfectly satisfied to have go over.

Mr. LANGER. Replying to the distinguished Senator from Maryland, if he wishes to ask for a quorum call, and we have a quorum, I have no objection.

Mr. TYDINGS. I appreciate that, but I doubt if we can do that, in view of the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin has already yielded to me for this purpose, but I venture to say to the distinguished Senator from North Dakota that if we had a full quorum present the Senator would find that every Member of the Senate would approve the immediate confirmation of this nomination. I hope that the Senator will make an exception to what I know to be a good rule, because this nomination involves our National Defense Establishment. Conditions in the Far East and all over the world are in a state of great confusion, and this will add one more peg of stability in our Defense Establishment.

Mr. LANGER. If the post has been vacant since last August, 2 or 3 days more will do no harm.

Mr. TYDINGS. I certainly do not think that is an accurate statement. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection because it will be most helpful to have the nomination confirmed, and I can assure him that its confirmation will be received throughout the Navy, which has had somewhat of a hard blow recently, as a reaffirmation that the Navy is back in the picture. It would be a good thing for morale and for the service generally. Will not the Senator reconsider, in view of the fact that all his colleagues on the committee have approved this nomination?

Mr. LANGER. I am almost persuaded by the eloquence of the distinguished Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not like to make horse trades on the floor of the Senate, although I must say there is a little horse-trading blood in my system, but I will say to my able friend from North Dakota that if he will accord full weight to the words the Senator from Maryland has uttered in good faith, the Senator from Maryland hopes some day to reciprocate on a like auspicious occasion when the Senator from North Dakota may have something which he deems important to his country.

Mr. LANGER. I repeat, I am almost persuaded, but it is a matter of principle with me. There are only a few Senators on the floor.

Mr. TYDINGS. If it were anything else but this, I should not even reiterate my request, but this is a routine nomination in one branch of the armed services, and, I can assure the Senator every minute counts. Will not the Senator therefore be willing to waive the rule and let me horse trade with him in private when I get to the point of bringing the mules out on exhibition?

Mr. McCARTHY. I have no serious objection to allowing the Senator to suggest the absence of a quorum so that this matter may be disposed of.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator yield for the call of a quorum, assuming he will not lose the floor?

Mr. McCARTHY. I shall be delighted to yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. That would satisfy the Senator from North Dakota. I ask unanimous consent that a quorum be called, and that the Senator from Wisconsin may not lose the floor because he yields for this purpose.

Mr. McCARTHY. I might say, before a quorum is called, that it will take infinitely more than this to convince me that it will put the Navy back in the defense picture. I have just looked over the President's budget, and I see that we are now in the unusual position of having a Marine Corps with practically no marines, and we shall very shortly have a Navy without any ships.

Mr. TYDINGS. I wish to have that straightened out, so I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brewster	Hendrickson	Martin
Bricker	Hill	Maybank
Connally	Holland	Morse
Donnell	Jenner	Mundt
Downey	Johnson, Tex.	O'Conor
Dworshak	Knowland	Schoeppel
Ferguson	Langer	Thomas, Okla.
Fulbright	Lehman	Thye
George	Lucas	Tydings
Gillette	McCarran	Wherry
Green	McCarthy	Wiley
Hayden	McMahon

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). A quorum is not present. The clerk will call the names of absent Senators.

The legislative clerk called the names of the absent Senators as far as the name of Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. FLANDERS, Mr. GURNEY, Mr. KILGORE, and Mr. McCLELLAN answered to their names when called.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the call of the roll to ascertain the presence of a quorum be vacated.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum has already been announced. The order cannot be withdrawn. The clerk will continue to call the names of absent Senators.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Can the order be vacated by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No. The absence of a quorum has already been announced. The clerk will continue to call the names of absent Senators.

The legislative clerk resumed calling the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. SMITH of New Jersey, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. STENNIS and Mr. TAYLOR answered to their names when called.

Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. ELLENDER, Mr. WATKINS, Mr. HICKENLOOPER, Mr. AIKEN, Mr. FREAR, Mr. KEM, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, Mr. GRAHAM, Mr. McFARLAND, Mr. SALTONSTALL, Mr. MYERS, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. EASTLAND, Mr. CAPEHART, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. MILLIKIN, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. TOBEY, Mrs. SMITH of Maine, Mr. YOUNG, Mr. VANDENBERG, Mr. NEELY, Mr. LODGE, Mr. THOMAS of Utah, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. TAFT, Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, Mr. CHAPMAN, Mr. ECTON, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr.

McKELLAR, Mr. O'MAHONEY, Mr. CORDON, Mr. HOEY, Mr. DARBY, Mr. IVES, Mr. LONG, Mr. HUNT, Mr. PEPPER, Mr. KEFAUVER, Mr. CAIN and Mr. MALONE also entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STENNIS in the chair). A quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the request of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] for unanimous consent for the consideration, as in executive session, of the nomination of Admiral Forrest P. Sherman, United States Navy, to be Chief of Naval Operations.

Is there objection? The Chair hears none——

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. McCARTHY] heard the Chair ask, "Is there objection?" The Chair was just about to announce there was no objection, I assume.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, reluctantly I shall be forced to object, not because I have anything against Admiral Sherman, nor because I do not think he may be a competent man for the job. I do not happen to be a member of the Armed Services Committee, which I understand held hearings today on the nomination of Admiral Sherman. I think this is a matter so important that all of us should have an opportunity at least to scan those hearings before he is confirmed.

I may say that when the question of confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman comes before us I shall want to discuss at some length a situation which I think is viciously dangerous to the security of the Nation, namely, the current usurpation of congressional prerogatives by the "Brass" in the Pentagon, and the complete iron curtain which has been established around the Pentagon, so that congressional committees can no longer obtain important information. At that time I shall also want to discuss in some detail the unusual circumstances under which Admiral Denfeld's nomination was withdrawn. The Senate confirmed the nomination of Admiral Denfeld. The President and the Senate considered him a competent man. As I recall, not a single voice was raised against the confirmation of his nomination.

Since that time, however, Admiral Denfeld, in answer to a subpena, came before a congressional committee and there performed not only his duty under subpena but also the statutory duty which we established when we passed the Unification Act, namely, the duty to tell the Congress honestly and frankly what he thought was wrong with the unification of the armed services. He did so. Immediately afterward, his nomination was nullified by his removal from the position by the President.

At the time when the question of confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Sherman comes before us, I wish to discuss not only that matter, but also the Crommelin case. Captain Crommelin, with whom I served in the Pacific, I consider to be one of the outstanding heroes of the last war—a brilliant man coming from a family which has an outstanding military record. That man, because he has the intestinal fortitude—the guts, if you please—to try to safeguard the Nation against a bad situation in the Pentagon, has had his career in the Navy practically ended. I wish to discuss that case also in some detail. I think the proper time to discuss it is when the nomination of the successor to Admiral Denfeld is before us for confirmation.

I have not had a chance to go over the Armed Services Committee's hearings. I shall do so tonight; and tomorrow I shall withdraw any objection to the immediate consideration of the nomination of Admiral Sherman.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I wish to thank the Senator from Wisconsin for his courtesy in yielding me the floor, and I wish to thank the Senator from North Dakota for making it possible for us to consider the unanimous-consent request.

However, in view of what the Senator from Wisconsin has said, I withdraw the request for the consideration of the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request is withdrawn, and the nomination will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the substitute amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield, to permit me to propound a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, preliminarily, I should like to say that we have been discussing the pending question, namely, the bill to repeal the oleomargarine tax, and for other purposes, since a week ago Wednesday, as I recall. It seems to me we have debated the issues rather thoroughly. There is not really very much of an issue involved. The Members of the Senate on both sides of the question have been afforded an opportunity to present their views, and of course there will be further time to do so under the unanimous-consent agreement which I shall propose, if it is agreed to.

What I hope to do is secure consent to have the Senate reach a vote tomorrow on the substitute offered by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] and the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE]. I am making the unanimous-consent request in the sincere hope that it will be agreed to.

I now ask unanimous consent that on the calendar day of Friday, January 13, at the hour of 4 o'clock p. m., the Senate proceed to vote, without further debate, upon the so-called Wiley-Gillette substitute for House bill 2023 to regulate oleomargarine, repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes, and all amendments thereto which are germane, including the so-called excise-tax provisions; that the time between 12 o'clock and 4 o'clock p. m. on said day be equally divided between the proponents and the opponents of said bill, and be controlled respectively by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY].

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. Would that include any motions? To put the matter concretely, let me say that some suggestion has been made that it might be advisable that a motion be made to strike from the substitute the excise tax repeal provisions. Thus we would get an express vote on that; and after that was over, we would then get a vote on the substitute, as modified.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, will the Senator please speak a little louder so that all of us can hear?

Mr. WILEY. There has been some talk about specific objection being made to the excise tax repeal provisions of the substitute. So I am asking the majority leader whether his unanimous-consent request would include any motion proposing to strike out those provisions. There would simply be a motion by some Senator to strike out. I wish to protect the rights of a Senator who has suggested that.

Mr. LUCAS. In reply to the Senator from Wisconsin, let me say that the agreement, if entered into, undoubtedly would protect that right. In other words, the Senator from Washington already has served notice on the Senate that at the proper time he will move to strike from the substitute the provisions dealing with the repeal of excise taxes. This unanimous-consent request would cover that motion.

Mr. WILEY. I had that in mind because of the discussion the other day. I thought one or two exchanges indicated possibly a lack of proper consideration of my brethren, and I wanted to make sure their rights in that particular were protected.

Mr. LUCAS. There can be no question about that, I may say to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, may I at this time ask whether there are any other amendments to the substitute pending?

Mr. LUCAS. That is a parliamentary question I cannot answer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are no amendments pending to the substitute.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry, if the Senator will yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. WHERRY. Any amendments which have been offered, which are on the table, or which have been called up, could be offered to the substitute, or to the original bill, could they not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be in order for amendments to be offered.

Mr. WHERRY. One or two amendments may be offered. I do not desire to hold up the request; in fact, I should like to get a vote on the substitute as quickly as possible. Personally I feel that the sooner we have a vote, the better. But I think it should be understood by those who are offering amendments that, unless an amendment is offered to the substitute before the substitute is adopted, they will then be foreclosed from amending the substitute, and the substitute will become the bill itself. Until that is clearly understood, it seems to me that those who have offered amendments should be informed of the procedure. If the majority leader is to press the request, I should like an opportunity to consult further one or two Senators who felt that there would not be a vote today on an amendment they might offer. Later on this afternoon, if no one else objects, if the Senator then presents his unanimous-consent request——

Mr. WILEY. Or tomorrow?

Mr. WHERRY. Or tomorrow would be all right—I would not say then that I would agree, but I should like to be certain that they are informed of the parliamentary situation before unanimous consent is given.

Mr. LUCAS. The unanimous-consent agreement, of course, provides for a vote at 4 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. WHERRY. I know, but if we enter into it now, of course, they will then be foreclosed.

Mr. LUCAS. I understand.

Mr. WHERRY. I myself am not objecting, and I am not sure the Senators I have in mind will object. All I am asking is that the distinguished majority leader present his unanimous-consent request later on in the afternoon, if he is willing to do that. If the amendments are not to be offered, it does not make any difference whether we vote today or tomorrow.

Mr. LUCAS. Of course, that would call for another quorum call.

Mr. WHERRY. I really think we should have another quorum call in connection with the unanimous-consent request, because, if it is agreed to, then, we shall have to vote on the substitute for the original bill.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I decline to yield any further, unless there is a chance of getting the unanimous-consent agreement. I have been yielding for about half an hour. Under ordinary circumstances I quite enjoy yielding. At the present time, however, the situation is that we have a very important meeting of the District Committee at 4 o'clock. We are reorganizing the committee. I have only about 20 minutes in which to speak, so I frankly must decline to yield further for any lengthy discourse.

Mr. AIKEN. I merely wanted to make a parliamentary inquiry as to whether, if unanimous consent is given to vote on the Gillette-Wiley amendment tomorrow, and the amendment is adopted, it will preclude the offering of any amendment to it at that time, because the Gillette-Wiley amendment would then become the bill itself and be subject to amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. I do not agree with the Senator.

Mr. AIKEN. I am asking the Presiding Officer for a ruling.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the precedents, the adoption of the substitute will preclude other amendments.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I must decline to yield further. I shall hold the floor for about 10 minutes only.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield further.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Was the request for unanimous consent refused?

Mr. McCARTHY. I decline to yield for a parliamentary inquiry, or for any other purpose. I intend to yield the floor in about 10 minutes. I am sure the Senator can wait that long. I decline to yield further only because I have been yielding for about a half an hour, and I have an important meeting at 4 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin may proceed.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I may say I sincerely hope the request of the majority leader will be granted. I sincerely hope we can get a vote on the pending bill tomorrow. I think by then it will have been fully and completely discussed.

I wish to thank the able Senator from Arkansas for accepting the McCarthy-Aiken amendments. I think his acceptance of those amendments makes his bill much less obnoxious, insofar as both the dairy farmers and the consumers are concerned.

I am very happy that we finally arrived at a clear-cut issue. The issue no longer is whether oleomargarine taxes are to be repealed. The dairy farmers, and the oleo interests are agreed that we should remove the taxes. The sole question now is, how much protection will be accorded the producer and the consumer. I believe the sole issue for debate now is the issue of fraud—an issue which neither the dairy farmers nor the consumers have created but an issue which the oleo monopoly itself has created by its own inequities of the past. The principal source of fraud is the attempted imitation of butter even down to the minutest detail of packaging. Certainly the housewife cannot gain any advantage by this type of fraud. Certainly the dairy farmer will gain nothing. The oleo monopoly, of course, will gain if they are allowed to continue this type of fraud and deception. If they can accomplish the sly removal of the few restraints which are now in existence our dairy farmers can go into bankruptcy. Whether the oleo manufacturers as a whole plan to perpetrate such frauds, the fact remains that the liberties they demand would make it easy for them to do so.

In my opinion, Mr. President, the oleo monopoly—and I use the phrase "oleo monopoly" advisedly—is to be roundly condemned for its insistence upon freedom from all restraints. Our own good sense tells us that the oleo manufacturers, even if they wanted to, could not control the actions of every retailer and every store clerk in the country, if we pass the type of legislation they request. Why then do they insist on exposing the consumers of the Nation to fraud? The answer is obvious. Even today, under existing regulatory taxes, the basic principles of commercial honesty are flouted by this gigantic monopoly and its large-scale distributors. Why should we believe that the oleo monopoly is to be trusted in the future, when we have never been able to trust it in the past and cannot trust it now?

Mr. President, let me demonstrate the truth of my last statement. I have with me two wax cartons, one of which has long been used by a leading butter producer, a farmer-owned and farmer-controlled cooperative. On each of the two main surfaces of this carton there appears a seal which declares that the contents are "Grade AA Butter." As every housewife knows, grade AA butter is butter of the very top quality—93-score butter, to be exact. Not every butter producer is able to achieve that quality. It brings a top price. It can only be sold with the approval of Government inspectors, who assign it high marks for texture and taste.

Mr. President, in my other hand I hold a carton recently adopted by Durkee—and remember the name, if you will—an oleo manufacturer, for distribution in the same territory where the butter producer does business. What do we find on the two main surfaces of this carton? We see that this oleomargarine is also labeled "Grade AA," despite the fact that there is no Federal grading whatever for oleomargarine. This oleo manufacturer clearly seeks a free ride on the coattails of the butter producer, who has established the grade AA rating as a symbol for the best in table spreads. Just to make the point a little more obvious, this oleo manufacturer has also applied the words "Grade AA" in even larger letters to one end of his box. The carton itself exactly follows the size and shape of the butter producer's carton, although in other parts of the country where dairy concerns use the familiar square box, oleo manufacturers also feel impelled to use square boxes.

Mr. President, why do you suppose the oleo industry follows the butter producers so closely in these matters? Is it because they lack faith in their own product and the courage to let it stand on its own merits? Or is it because it is commercially more profitable to imitate in every respect the packaging of another man's product, a recognized product, a quality product, that already has universal acceptance?

Turning this same oleo carton on its side we discover a travesty of the Government's own certificate of approval printed along one edge, and superimposed on that spurious certificate is a red stamp carrying the letters "AA" and the word "certified." Who has "certified" this oleo to be "grade AA"? None other than Durkee's Famous Foods, a concern that offers "with pride and confidence"—and I am quoting the label now—an oleo which uses "pasteurized fat-free milk."

That is a tricky phrase, Mr. President—"pasteurized fat-free milk." I lived on a farm for some time. We used to feed the hogs skim milk. We never tried to deceive the hogs and say "This is pasteurized fat-free milk."

Moreover, the manufacturers of Durkee's Famous Foods are not in the dairy industry, as I am advised in very small type by something which looks a great deal like a Good Housekeeping seal of approval. It would seem like Durkee's Famous Foods belong to a family classed roughly as "Glidden quality products." Somewhere in the back of my mind I associate the name Glidden with paints; and, sure enough, it turns out that this oleomargarine is the product of the gigantic Glidden Corp., which makes paints.

Mr. President, I have accustomed myself to the idea that oleomargarine and soap are first cousins, and that, indeed, the difference occurs only in the final stage of conception. If the fats and oils people turn a knob one way, their cottonseed, or soybean, or palm oils come out as laundry soap, or bath soap, or even soap flakes. If, however, they turn the knob the other way at the last moment, they get oleomargarine—"fresh churned," so they say—in the aforementioned "pasteurized fat-free milk." When I use the expression "fresh churned" I am again quoting from the oleo industry's own misleading advertisements.

They are playing upon the lack of knowledge of the consumer when they talk about fresh-churned fat-free milk. As any farmer or any consumer who has taken time to study the subject knows, there is no such thing as fresh-churned fat-free milk.

I ask the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE], who also was a farmer, whether there is any way to churn "fat-free milk."

Mr. THYE. I will say to the able Senator that we can churn it and tumble it around all we like to, but no butter comes out of skim milk.

Mr. McCARTHY. I thank the Senator.

I have here another very interesting advertisement. It is another Durkee advertisement. It uses the words "country fresh." It displays a large picture of what at first glance appears to be a butter carton. There is a drawing of a barn, a silo, and a pasture.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. In view of the fact that I have accepted the Senator's amendment, I should like to inquire the Senator's purpose in discussing it further——

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I was very happy that the Senator from Arkansas accepted the amendment and promised to take it to conference. I want to show the need for acceptance of the amendment in conference, however. I think, unless it is accepted, extremely bad legislation will result. I am discussing it at this time to show the Senate the necessity of insistence that we retain the McCarthy-Aiken amendment in conference.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The only difficulty is that if by chance the Wiley substitute is adopted, which prohibits the shipment of margarine in interstate commerce, it would seem to me that it would take margarine beyond the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission, and it would be inconsistent to undertake to regulate something and then to declare that it cannot be moved in interstate commerce. I would not be in favor the Wiley amendment. That would seem to take away jurisdiction over the greater part of the business.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think the Senator from Arkansas is outstanding in his knowledge of a great number of subjects, except in strictly legal questions.

I think there can be no conceivable question but that the same power to regulate will exist regardless of whether the Wiley amendment is adopted.

The principal difference between the Wiley amendment and the Fulbright bill is that under the Wiley amendment oleomargarine producers are prohibited from shipping in interstate commerce oleomargarine which is colored so as to imitate butter. Such being the case, it cannot, in my opinion, conceivably take from the Federal Trade Commission any of the powers which that body presently possesses.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If we undertake to prohibit oleomargarine from interstate commerce, and, in the same bill, attempt to regulate it, it is an inconsistent position. I thought the Senator would be quite satisfied with the adoption of his own amendment.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am infinitely less dissatisfied with the bill of the Senator from Arkansas if it contains the McCarthy-Aiken amendment.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. One of the considerations in accepting the amendment was that I thought it would reduce the debate on the bill.

Mr. McCARTHY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, the manufacturers of Durkee's oleomargarine have very obviously embarked on a completely dishonest advertising campaign which has as its basis the misappropriation of the butter-grading system of the United States Department of Agriculture. This grading system has been in existence since 1943. It means a great deal to a producer of butter to merit an AA listing which means 93 score. The benefit of this listing is completely nullified by the dishonest advertising campaign of an outfit such as Durkee.

I had planned to discuss advertising containing the word "fresh" and the words "country fresh", but I notice that some of the other Senators have discussed it in some detail, so I shall spend very little time on it. However, I have here a large advertisement, approximately 2 feet by 4 feet in size, which says "country fresh churned." It also uses the word "milk." It uses the phrases "fresh dairylike flavor" and "no artificial flavoring."

Mr. President, as I have already stated, oleomargarine does not come from the country, but from an oil mill consisting of tanks, pipes, valves, and knobs. That oil mill can be owned by a soap company, or a paint company, or an international cartel employing slaves on the coast of Africa—but none of these things has anything to do with the American countryside as represented by barns and silos. As I have additionally stated, oleomargarine is not fresh, but uses a preservative, as it is so required to state by law. Nothing can be fresh and preserved at one and the same time. That ought to be obvious to anyone. Yet, this advertisement, sponsored by a supposedly reputable corporation, undertakes to tell the housewives of America that oleomargarine containing a preservative is not only fresh, but country fresh. In the face of this evidence, how are we to believed that the oleomargarine interests can be trusted with a color which is the traditional color of butter unless we very closely control their advertising?

Mr. President, there is one other matter before the Senate, namely, the question of removing taxes other than taxes on oleomargarine. Many of us feel very strongly that if we are going to remove the oleomargarine tax it is only common sense, honesty, and fairness also to remove many of the other misnamed luxury taxes. I concede that it is improper for a housewife to be forced to pay a tax on oleomargarine if she wants to buy it and knows what she is buying. I think it is equally improper to force the housewife to pay a luxury tax on the stove upon which to cook or to force her, for example, when she goes to the corner drug store to buy cosmetics or baby powder, to pay a luxury tax on such items.

I do not think that there is anything luxurious, as one mother said to me, in having to take care of the baby and getting the necessary oils and powder.

Another of the taxes which we propose to eliminate is the tax on ranch-raised furs. That is a very important matter to the people of my State and to people of other States, such as Utah, Washingington, Iowa, and so forth. Presently a very contradictory course is being followed, Mr. President. An attempt is being made to tax out of existence one very important branch of agriculture, namely, the fur farmer. We are taxing him out of existence while at the same time we are subsidizing other branches of agriculture. I know there are those who say this is the wrong time to remedy this situation, that at some later date we will be allowed to repeal the excise taxes.

Mr. President, we have before us the Butler-McCarthy amendment. That is no quickly conceived amendment. We have taken the product of the Finance Committee's work. We have taken an amendment which they attached to another bill which has been pending before the Senate for some time, to remove those excise taxes which the Finance Committee, after long study, said should be removed. If it was proper for the Finance Committee to attach that amendment to another bill, which undoubtedly will never come before the Senate, then it would seem to be equally proper that we attach the same amendment to this bill and remove those excise or luxury taxes at the same time that we remove the tax on oleomargarine.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I think it is true that in a debate on issues with which Senators have had considerable personal experience they are bound to speak from a certain amount of personal bias. At the outset of my remarks this afternoon, Mr. President, I wish to plead guilty to a certain amount of personal bias on this issue, but I believe that whatever bias may exist in my point of view is compensated for or offset somewhat by the experience I have had in this particular field.

For many years in my youth I was known in Madison, Wis., among a great many consumers, as the "butter boy," in that each Saturday I delivered, on what was known as a dairy route, the butter which was churned during the week from the milk and cream produced by the cows on our farm. I wish today that I had one dollar for every hour I sat in the cellar of that old farmhouse and churned one of the old barrel churns by hand. I could at least approach my coming campaign for reelection without so much concern about where the money is to come from. If I had a dollar for each one of those hours I churned butter when I was a boy I would have plenty of money for my campaign.

I make these statements in fairness to my colleagues, so that they will know at least the bias from which I speak. I hope also that they will give me credit for having had some basis for my conclusions because of my experience from spending a great many years on a dairy farm.

I make these preliminary remarks also because some of my friends in American labor seem to be somewhat perplexed because I have not swallowed with them the oleo lobby's propaganda in regard to the oleomargarine issue. I think the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] very effectively answered those within the American labor movement who have been misled into the conclusion that injuring the American dairy industry by supporting the extreme demands of the oleo lobby is in the best interests of American labor. I point out to the workers of America that they ought to recognize before it is too late that there is a great need for a much greater cooperation between American workers and American farmers in solving the great economic problems which confront the Nation, and I should like to have the workers of America realize that in the last analysis the size of their pay checks is dependent upon a prosperous agriculture. The economy of the United States is, after all, basically an agricultural economy, and whenever the agricultural economy goes into a recession or a depression, it is only a short time before those wearing the overalls in the factories of America begin to feel the effect of an unprosperous agriculture.

Thus, as one who is proud of his record in insisting upon fair play for American workers, I am equally proud, Mr. President, of my record of insisting upon fair play for the American farmers. So I would call the attention of American labor to some of the comments made last Friday by the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN].

Let me say, by way of sincere compliment to the distinguished Senator from Vermont, that in my judgment labor does not have a better friend in the Senate of the United States, and I am very happy to join forces on this issue, as I do on so many issues, with the Senator from Vermont, in pointing out to representatives of American labor that they had better do some rethinking in respect to the oleo issue. Some is being done, because in the debate on this issue this year we notice a little different attitude on the part of the legislative representatives of organized labor who pay us visits occasionally in the reception room of the Senate. Apparently they are beginning to question whether or not their position on this issue in times gone by has been as sound as they have been led to believe, and this year some great unions, particularly within the A. F. of L., are openly supporting the position of those of us who are sponsoring the Gillette-Wiley substitute.

Last Friday the Senator from Vermont, in a notable speech, made certain comments which I should like to have reprinted as a part of my remarks this afternoon. I have marked them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of last Friday, and I ask unanimous consent to have them inserted in my remarks at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STENNIS in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXTRACTS FROM REMARKS OF SENATOR AIKEN IN THE SENATE FRIDAY, JANUARY 6, 1950

I was informed yesterday by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, United States Department of Agriculture, that the average hourly farm wage rate in three important cotton-producing States is as follows: Mississippi, 40 cents an hour; Arkansas, 47 cents an hour; Georgia, 37 cents an hour.

In contrast to these very low rates, we find the great dairy State of Washington paying its agricultural labor 93 cents an hour; Iowa pays its labor 71 cents an hour, and Minnesota, 68 cents an hour.

But this hourly wage comparison is not the whole story. The worker on the dairy farm has to work every day of the year, including Sundays. Whether he wants to work or not, he has to work every day.

The worker on the cotton farm has a seasonal proposition to deal with.

Therefore, the yearly earnings of the dairy worker are still further out of proportion to those of the cottonfield worker than a comparison of the hourly earnings would indicate.

If the materials used in manufacturing oleo were produced by as highly paid labor as that employed on dairy farms, there would be little difference between the cost of oleo and the cost of butter.

Even with these low wage rates, the cotton grower of the South is in trouble. He is trying to produce and continue to produce cotton on land which has been producing cotton for 150 years.

He is continuing to grow a soil-depleting crop and doing the best he can to make up for that depletion by adding chemical fertilizer.

* * * * *

But I wish to point out that it is not only agricultural labor which is much cheaper in the South; it is also industrial labor. The average factory worker in Arkansas is paid 90 cents an hour, as compared with $1.16 an hour which is paid to the average factory worker in Michigan.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I shall not yield during the course of my remarks, because I realize that the hour is late, but I shall be happy to yield when I have finished my formal address. I recognize further that to a great extent my remarks will be by way of reiteration and repetition of a point of view. But I do wish to make the record this afternoon, for future reference, of the position I take in support of the Gillette-Wiley substitute, and why I take it.

RIDICULOUS OLEO CLAIMS

Mr. President, the campaign of the oleo interests for the repeal of most Federal regulations on the manufacture and sale of their product colored yellow in imitation of butter has been characterized by some of the most ridiculous arguments imaginable. These absurd statements would be laughable were it not for the fact that they tend seriously to mislead large numbers of consumers who have no real knowledge or understanding of the importance of the dairy industry in their daily lives. Even so, I am sure that the Members of this body—many of whom were once farm boys themselves—will appreciate a review of the more ludicrous claims advanced by the oleo interests, purely for the entertainment value to be found in them.

OLEO REGULATIONS ARE A RESTRAINT ON FREE ENTERPRISE

A favorite contention of the oleo lobbyists, for instance, is that restrictions on yellow oleomargarine are a handicap to their industry. This is the propaganda line reserved for retail and wholesale grocers in particular, and for other businessmen in general. In addressing the business community, the oleo crowd invariably refers to Federal controls as "discriminatory" or "punitive," and argues that such controls are in restraint of trade and a discouragement of free enterprise.

The fact is that while oleomargarine consumption equaled only 14.9 percent of butter consumption in 1928, it amounted to 59.8 percent of butter volume in 1948. In other words, the oleomargarine manufacturers have improved their position in relation to butter fourfold in a single generation. Is this to be characterized as the result of discrimination? Can any business honestly be said to be handicapped when it shows such remarkable growth in so short a time? Have the Federal oleo laws actually stifled free enterprise in this instance? I think my colleagues will agree that they have not.

Coincident with the increase in oleo sales, butter consumption has dropped from 16.4 pounds per capita in 1938, to only 10.2 pounds per capita in 1948. During the same period, oleo consumption per capita more than doubled, showing an increase of from 2.9 pounds to 6.1 pounds for every consumer. Within the past few months the five leading manufacturers of oleomargarine have increased their production to 68.4 percent of the national total, whereas, a few months ago, they enjoyed slightly over 61 percent of the business. Despite the Federal regulations of which they complain, the five top companies are growing even bigger, and their profits are setting new records every week. Four new oleo plants were built in the early months of 1948 alone. Surely this is not typical of an industry that is suffering under trade restraints.

According to a market report prepared by McCall's magazine, World War II raised the normal prewar annual production of oleomargarine from 359,000,000 pounds (average 1936–40) to 588,000,000 pounds in 1944. The National Association of Margarine Manufacturers estimated that this 1944 production reflected an extra civilian wartime demand of 154,000,000 pounds with the balance of the gain attributable to orders of the War Food Administration. Comparison of grocery-store sales of oleomargarine, from the same source, indicates an increase from 224,000,000 pounds in 1942 to 497,000,000 pounds for the comparable 1945 period. In other words, grocery-store sales of oleomargarine more than doubled in 3 years. The association estimated that by the end of 1946, 72 percent of grocery-store customers were oleomargarine users.

By contrast, Government diversion of a large portion of the milk supply to the manufacturers of evaporated milk and cheese, products in great demand for lend-lease, caused substantial drops in butter production during the latter war years. The 1944 output supplied less than 12 pounds per capita, including farm butter. The amount actually made available through commercial channels amounted to only 9 pounds per capita. An OPA survey at the time showed that people placed the lack of butter at the very top of their list of annoyances caused by wartime shortages. Since the butter shortage was due chiefly to Government regulation, Mr. President, it is easy to see that the dairy farmers, and not the oleomargarine manufacturers, were the ones who were discriminated against.

Increase in ration-point value of butter to its high of 24 points per pound, late in 1944, further accelerated sales of oleomargarine, which required only 5 points per pound. The result was that butter piled up on retailers' shelves during the early months of 1945. This was due to bungling by the War Food Administration, which had anticipated considerably higher demands on the butter supply later that year, when the end of the war changed the supply picture. Differentials in ceiling prices for butterfat resulted in a considerable scarcity of butter on the market even after the removal of rationing. This was not corrected before the lifting of ceilings on dairy products in the summer of 1946. It is not possible to judge accurately what effect these steps would have had on the ratio of butter to oleomargarine sales under more normal supply conditions, but we can take it for granted that the boom in oleomargarine sales was at least an indirect result of Government discrimination against dairy farmers.

A survey for the National Association of Margarine Manufacturers in 1944–45 purported to show that 61 percent of American families, or twice as many as appeared in a similar survey in 1941, were then using oleomargarine. Acceptance of oleomargarine for cooking and table use among upper-income families had increased six times over the 1941 figure. We may attribute this to the same wartime-induced shortage of butter to which I have already referred, but it is further evidence that the oleomargarine industry has not been and is not now subject to restraint of trade. Use of oleo by city housewives was claimed to have increased three times in the period covered by the oleo manufacturers' own survey. Surely that would be an unusual result of punitive Government regulations, if such regulations were directed against the oleomargarine industry, as its spokesmen claim.

A study by the Home Makers Guild, made in 1946 through a panel of housewives representing all sections of the Nation, showed that 71.6 percent had increased their use of oleomargarine because of Government-created shortages of butter. Oleomargarine was named as the preferred substitute for butter, as a spread for bread, by 61.8 percent of the women questioned. Here again we see evidence of stimulated oleomargarine sales resulting from wartime discriminations against butter outlets for the dairy farmer.

The Wall Street Journal of January 28, 1948, estimated creamery butter output in 1947 at 1,300,000,000 pounds, or 26 percent below the 1939 figure. In the same period, oleomargarine production rose from 301,000,000 pounds to a record of 746,000,000 pounds. While drops in butter prices during the latter half of 1948 brought about some decreases in oleomargarine sales, estimated production of oleo for that year was at an all-time high of 920,000,000 pounds. Estimates by Best Foods Co. in the New York Herald Tribune of September 14, 1947, indicated that by 1946 two families out of every three were oleomargarine users, as against only one family out of every three in 1941. Would those figures indicate to any impartial observer that the oleomargarine industry has been handicapped by restrictions on free enterprise?

According to an analysis of the 1948 outlook for the oleomargarine industry published in March 1948 by Tide magazine, the oleo manufacturers spent about $6,000,000 in advertising during the year ended November 1, 1947, as compared to a prewar annual advertising expenditure of about $1,500,000. A more recent article in the same publication quotes the A. C. Nielsen Co. to the effect that oleomargarine manufacturers spent $5,371,000 in advertising during the first 9 months of 1948 alone. Is this a logical expenditure for a group of companies which really believe that their operations are being handicapped by Federal regulations? Mr. President, the claims of the oleo interests that the development of their industry has in any way been hindered by the regulations which they now seek to have removed are ridiculous on the face of the evidence at hand.

"YELLOW OLEO WON'T HARM THE DAIRY FARMER"

The bankrupting of creamery butter plants is not a mere matter of business failure within the dairy industry; it represents a shrinkage of our national resources for handling and distributing the milk produced by the dairy farmer. Butter has long been the balance wheel of the dairy industry. It is the form in which surplus milk can most readily be stored and shipped to distant markets. So long as cows continue to give more milk during flush seasons than in wintertime, it will be necessary for the dairy farmer to have butter outlets for milk that cannot be sold in bottles.

As dairy prices decline, more and more milk fails to find a market in the more profitable forms, and must be held over for later distribution and consumption. This underlines the historic need for creamery butter plants in our enormously intricate system of marketing milk and other dairy products. Yet the oleomargarine interests are fond of saying that the manufacture and sale of their yellow product will have no adverse effect on dairy-farmer prosperity. The National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation, however, has developed a forecast of what will happen if unrestricted sale of yellow oleomargarine is permitted in the United States. This prediction is based on, first, what has happened in other countries where the manufacture and sale of yellow oleo has been allowed; and, second, calculations under the widely accepted relationship between production and prices of butter—under which given changes in the supply of butter are traditionally associated with similar but opposite changes in prices. If unrestricted sale of yellow oleo is permitted, it is estimated that—

First. Yellow oleo will replace butter, to a volume of as much as 6,000,000 pounds annually.

Second. This increase in yellow oleo sales will result in a decrease in the price of butter of from 25 to 40 percent.

Third. Contractions in butter sales will cost the American dairy farmers $638,000,000 in income a year.

Fourth. Serious dislocations in the markets and prices of other dairy products, including fluid milk, will affect 40,000 milk-processing plants and 2,500,000 dairy-farm families in every State in the Union.

That is why I say, Mr. President, that labor had better take note of the relationship of this problem to the worker's pay check because when 2,500,000 dairy families are affected, with the great purchasing power their consumer strength represents, labor simply cannot afford to ignore the fact that there is a direct relationship between the prosperity of the people on the farm and the prosperity of the people in the factories.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I have already announced I will not yield until I finish my speech. Then I shall be glad to yield.

I would also have labor constantly keep in mind the fact that within the agricultural economy the dairy segment of it is the most basic. It produces the greatest amount of wealth, as I shall show later in this speech; it is, after all, the segment of the agricultural economy which determines in large measure the level of our agricultural economy as a whole at any given time.

Fifth. The resulting slaughter of an estimated 2,000,000 head of dairy cattle by farmers who will be forced out of the milk business will disrupt livestock and meat prices and marketing.

Sixth. Dissipation of our soil resources will result from the subsequent discouragement of dairy farming, now the most important contributor to sound soil-conservation practices, and one that requires no subsidy.

Seventh. A consequent depression in a critically important branch of agriculture will affect retail sales and economic life in cities, towns, and hamlets throughout every section of America.

The dairy farmer, and, indeed, the entire dairy industry, is dependent upon butter outlets as a stabilizer of prices for milk and other manufactured dairy products. No other balance wheel exists in this vast industry, for the simple reason that no other final reservoir for milk surpluses has ever been found that could equal the convenience and simplicity of storage in the form of butter. The importance of butter outlets to the dairy farmer is only partially suggested by the fact that 26.9 percent of all the milk produced in America last year eventually reached the consumer in that form.

We have already seen that an increase in the sale of oleomargarine has been accompanied historically by a decrease in the sale of butter. It is rank nonsense to pretend that a substitute product which threatens to reduce butter outlets for more than one-quarter of the Nation's milk supply will not hurt the dairy farmer.

Would any economist in his right mind suggest that the loss of almost 27 percent of its market would not hurt the Nation's steel industry? Would any Members of this body argue that a 25-percent drop in the demand for automobiles would bring anything but harm to our gigantic automotive industry? Of course not. Yet, the dairy industry is one and one-half times the size of our steel industry, and considerably larger than our automotive industry. It is the largest single source of farm income in America, as I have previously pointed out.

Milk is more important to American agriculture than corn, or hogs, or cotton, or wheat, or any other product of our farms. The production and distribution of milk is inextricably linked to the prices of butter and other manufactured dairy products. Therefore, the current decline in farm income is but a forerunner of things to come if yellow oleomargarine is to be allowed to enter into unregulated and unfair competition with butter, a vital source of income and a historical stabilizer of prices for the American farmer.

Mr. President, I am not opposed to the removal of the tax on oleomargarine. I am an advocate of it. But I think it is fallacious to argue that because we remove the tax on oleomargarine, ipso facto we must then support no regulation whatsoever on the sale of oleomargarine. It was pointed out the other day, on this floor, by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] that, after all, after the removal of the tax, there is then an obligation on the part of the Senate to see to it that there is fair regulation of the industry so as to prevent its misleading and potentially fraudulent practices from being imposed upon the consumer, because there is no question about the fact, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] pointed out a few moments ago, that the oleomargarine business is conducted on the basis of an imitation process.

I wish to digress just long enough to pay the Senator from Wisconsin a very much deserved compliment for the great fight he has put up, along with the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], in support of the Wiley-Gillette amendment, throughout this debate. Here are two men, not only from farm States, but two men who understand the problems of the dairy farmer, two men who have been pleading—and, I hope, not in vain—with their colleagues on the floor of the Senate to recognize that we are dealing with a problem which involves a need for fair regulation of the oleomargarine industry in order to protect the consumer from its imitation practices which, in my judgment, at least, as was pointed out by the Senators to whom I have just referred, border on gross misrepresentation and deception.

So, as one who supports the Wiley-Gillette amendment and as one who supports the elimination not only of the excise taxes on oleomargarine but excise taxes generally, I would advise American consumers to keep clearly in mind that those of us who are sponsoring the Wiley-Gillette amendment are agreeable to the elimination of the tax, but we feel it our obligation to protect the consumers of the country from what I consider to be, to put it by way of understatement, the potentialities of fraud and misrepresentation practiced upon American consumers by the oleomargarine industry.

Now, Mr. President, let us listen to some of the arguments which are made by the oleomargarine industry. One of them is, "Let them sell fluid milk"—referring to the dairy farmers, of course. When faced with the facts of life as regards our agricultural economy, the oleo lobby is prone to resort to an unrealistic bit of advice that could appeal, I think, only to the uninformed, to those who have not studied the facts. Our dairy farmers, say the oleo interests, would be better off if they disposed of their entire output of milk in fluid form. When they make that argument, Mr. President, they either show a gross ignorance of farm problems and a great lack of information about the operation of a dairy farm or they plead guilty to seeking to mislead the American people by a fallacious argument. This assertion on the part of the oleomargarine interests has great appeal to city consumers, who—I am afraid—are easily misled into believing that milk is merely another commodity that appears on their doorsteps without being touched by human hands. The fact is, of course, that the processing and distributing of milk and other dairy products constitutes one of the most complex and delicately balanced triumphs of marketing ever developed by our American system of free enterprise.

No longer is the city dweller dependent upon nearby farms for his entire supply of dairy products. Our vast municipal milksheds reach out from metropolitan centers for hundreds of miles in all directions. A shortage of cream in New York City, such as could easily be produced by the recent drought in upper New York State and in New England, is now readily overcome by refrigerator-tank-car shipments originating in States as far distant as North and South Dakota. Many of the dairy needs of Texas—and they are heavy, because Texas is a cotton State that cannot yet supply its own industrial centers from its own dairy herds—are met by shipments from Wisconsin. For practical reasons, however, it is not possible to deliver bottled milk at any such distances. Milk is a highly perishable commodity. It can be sold in bottles only to consumers who are comparatively near at hand. That was pointed out, I think, in a magnificent way the other day by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY].

This means that a policy of selling fluid milk would automatically signal the extinction of the thriving dairy farms of Iowa, Oklahoma, South Dakota, and more than 17 other States that do not have metropolitan markets for the bottled product. A lack of such metropolitan markets accounts for the fact that more than 73 percent of all the milk produced in North Dakota, for example, goes into butter. Over 70 percent of Iowa's milk is sold for butter. These are but two of the many States that simply do not find it practical or even possible to market their milk in bottles. The mere assertion that they ought to do so does not automatically create the concentrated industrial centers that are required to absorb their heavy milk production.

The average dairy farmer would be the first to agree that it would be nice to sell all his milk in fluid form—if he could. He would like to, if he could. Bottled milk is the most profitable of all dairy products. Every dairy farmer has his eye on that particular market, and naturally he does his level best to sell as much fluid milk as he can. Even so, little more than 40 percent of our entire national production of milk reaches the consumer in bottled form. Significantly enough, the next largest outlet for milk is in the form of butter which—as I have already said—absorbs 27 percent of our milk supply.

Butter, which ranks second only to fluid milk as a volume outlet, is the least profitable source of dairy-farm income. Butter is the final reservoir for surplus milk, and if the dairy farmer did not have that reservoir in which to store his surplus milk, it would be wasted. Between these extremes of operation will be found the other manufactured dairy products, such as cheese, dried milk, evaporated milk, and ice cream. According to variations in demand, you may be sure the dairy farmer will always dispose of his milk production in the form that returns him the highest profit from the facilities at hand. He does not need the oleo lobby to tell him that he will make more money from fluid milk than from anything else. He already knows that. He does not require urging by the oleo interests to develop fluid milk markets to the utmost limit of their capacity because, through his farmer-owned and farmer-managed cooperatives, he is already creating and serving new customers for fluid milk as rapidly as possible.

What the dairy farmer would prefer to learn from the oleo propagandists is the secret of conjuring up metropolitan markets in such States as Nebraska and the Dakotas. Those mythical markets exist only in the minds of the copy writers now employed by the oleomargarine manufacturers to tell 2,500,000 American dairy farmers how to run their businesses. As soon as the oleomargarine industry locates those nonexistent cities for the benefit of Mr. Rand and Mr. McNally, I can assure the Senators that the dairy farmers of those otherwise remote States will turn their fluid milk-marketing techniques loose on them, to the profit of all concerned.

Meanwhile, however, there remains the purely practical matter of getting rid of millions of gallons of milk, a problem which is not a dream, but an everyday reality facing the dairy farmer. Until the oleo lobby can offer something more than wishful thinking in the way of outlets to replace the butter market, dairy farmers in remote areas will continue to deliver their surplus milk to local creameries. These creameries will continue to turn that milk into butter, a product marketable at any distance and in any season. That is, they will do so unless further inroads on the butter market by yellow oleomargarine eliminate such outlets altogether. In that case dairy farmers will send their cows to slaughter, as they have been forced to do in increasing numbers since 1941.

Mr. President, as one who knows something about the practical day-by-day problems of the dairy farm, I would have my labor friends remember that if there is any substantial reduction in the size of America's dairy herds, then the economic result is bound to be an increase in the price of fluid milk in the bottles placed on the workers' doorsteps each morning. One reason why I am such a stanch advocate of the Gillette-Wiley amendment is my sincere conviction that the ultimate result of the unfair competition of oleomargarine against the dairy farmer, unless we as a Congress impose fair and reasonable restrictions, will be to increase the price of fluid milk. We are able to maintain the price at the level at which it is now maintained, because the surplus milk can be used under present conditions for butter, making it possible for the dairy farmer to keep his fluid milk at a lower price than will be the case once we permit unfair competition to take over in the industry and the size of the dairy herd is reduced to a level where it will have the inevitable economic result of increasing the price of fluid milk itself.

Mr. President, we have lost 3,000,000 dairy cows in that period, and the decline last year was the sharpest in history, according to the United States Department of Agriculture. Does anyone believe that a dairy farmer, deprived of his butter outlets, would rather sell off his cows than sell fluid milk? Of course not. The only possible explanation for the drop in dairy-cow numbers is that fluid milk markets do not exist in the great butter-producing States. That is, they do not exist to the extent necessary to take care of the surplus. This point is further brought out by the fact that by far the largest decline in our cow population has taken place in those States. When I speak of surplus, I am referring to the seasonal surplus. The surplus of fluid milk naturally results in the spring and early summer when the cows are turned out on green grass. In South Dakota in the last 3 years, the number of dairy cows has been reduced 25 percent; in Kansas, 25 percent; in Nebraska, 24 percent; in Oklahoma, 22 percent.

The results are clearly visible for all to see; the States that have let down the bars on yellow oleomargarine have injured themselves not only as butter customers but as recipients of the unending supply of dairy products, including beef and veal, that previously came from those lost dairy herds. "Let 'em sell fluid milk" is more than a misleading slogan for the oleo interests; it is a mockery of all that dairy farming stands for in the States that lie beyond the reach of metropolitan milksheds, and of all that the consumer has learned to expect from the dairy industry. The paid propagandist who tells a women's club that dairy farmers could or should sell their entire output of milk in fluid form has as his aim not only the destruction of a competitor in the table spread market, but the elimination of animal agriculture, and the substitution of vegetable fats and oils in our national diet.

If the average housewife understood that she was being deprived not only of butter but of beef and veal by such propaganda, I am sure that she would be the first to raise her voice for continued protection of the dairy farmer. If she realized that her daily supply of fresh milk was at stake, as well as the ice cream, the cheese, and the evaporated milk that she has learned to rely upon, I think her protests would be louder than all the petitions drummed up by the oleo interests at the rate of 10 cents per signature. If people understood that one-quarter of all the food consumed in this country stems from the dairy industry, I do not believe that they would favor the weakening of that industry by attacks on the vital butter outlets that mean so much to the dairy farmer and to our agricultural economy as a whole.

"THERE IS LITTLE DANGER OF FRAUD FROM YELLOW OLEO SALES"

Another of the oleo lobby's remarkable policy lines is the one to the effect that yellow oleomargarine offers no real possibility of fraud. The treatment of this subject by oleo spokesmen alternates between airy dismissal of the whole matter as being unworthy of mention, and hurt but earnest protestations of commercial integrity. In the latter respect we are assured that oleo is now big business, and that the responsible multi-million-dollar corporations that control it are far above chicanery and double-dealing.

Mr. President, I am willing to accept the latter premise, with certain reservations. I believe that the big organization, with responsibilities to its stockholders, does not dare overreach itself to the point where its operations might invite investigation. I do not believe, however, that those same factors offer any protection whatever to the consumer in other respects. On the contrary, it is the duty of management to charge all that the traffic will bear in order to show the largest possible profit for its stockholders.

No one can say that the oleo interests have been backward in that last respect. Oleomargarine is one of the largest, if not the largest, profit item in the entire food field. Where the profit on a pound of butter is a quarter of a cent or less, the profit on a pound of oleomargarine—costing half as much as butter—is 3 cents or more. In other words, the big oleo manufacturers do not feel constrained to price their product on the basis of the ingredients used, but merely set their selling price at approximately half of the retail price of butter. Apparently that is the price bracket which attracts the maximum number of buyers, because that is the level at which oleo manufacturers have consistently priced their product for a good many years.

When the price of butter goes up, the price of oleomargarine also goes up, regardless of the then existing quotations for cottonseed and soybean oils. It has sometimes happened that the costs of these raw materials have declined meanwhile, which would suggest a cut rather than an increase in the selling price of oleomargarine. Such variations in the cash return to cotton and soybean growers never seem to make much difference to the oleo manufacturers, however. With one hand the oleo interests pay out proportionately less money to our domestic suppliers of vegetable oils, while with the other hand, they jack up the retail selling price of oleo to its traditional level in relation to butter. The extra profit goes to the five giant corporations which control not only 68 percent of the oleomargarine market, but the refineries that supply the smaller oleo manufacturers with hydrogenated vegetable oils.

A comparative newcomer to the American oleo field is Unilever, Ltd., of London, England, which now owns the John Jelke Co. in this country. Unilever, Ltd., has what amounts to a monopoly of the world-wide fats and oils trade outside of this country, and can doubtless supply raw materials from its overseas plantations at even lower prices than our American farmers now receive for cottonseed and soybean oils. I am sure, Mr. President, that no one in this room is so naive as to believe that the result would be lower oleomargarine costs to the consumer. This attitude toward the low-income groups who must eat oleo or go without a table spread may not be fraudulent practice in the legal sense, but it is certainly at variance with our American concept of mass production as applied to the free-enterprise system. It certainly is in conflict with my sense of ethics, or what I think ought to be good business practice.

We believe, do we not, that lowered costs should be passed on to the consumer in order to widen the markets and make more goods available to everyone? The oleo interests have shown by their actions, however, that they do not agree with this principle. Instead, the oleo manufacturers seek to destroy thousands of small local creameries through unfair competition for the table-spread market. They have millions of dollars to spend on advertising and propaganda, and millions more with which to mislead women's clubs and professional consumer groups as to the true economic interests involved. They have spent, and are spending, those millions for precisely such purposes. Such actions may not be illegal, but they certainly are not good practice, and in my judgment border on business immorality.

It is not necessary, however, to confine ourselves to generalities in the matter of fraudulent sales of yellow oleomargarine. Available evidence indicates that if Congress removes Federal regulations on oleo colored yellow in imitation of butter, the Nation is in for a truly unprecedented increase in consumer deception. As an example of this danger, we need go no further than the restaurant business, which serves 65,000,000 meals a day in this country.

The State of Arkansas has on its statute books certain protective measures, which were designed to prevent the fraudulent serving of yellow oleomargarine as butter in public eating places. These regulations are almost identical with the provisions of H. R. 2023, which are also intended to safeguard restaurant patrons. The law of the State of Arkansas provides that each individual serving of oleomargarine in a public eating place must be clearly identified as such, either by identifying the pat of oleo itself, or by marking the plate on which it is brought to the table. Yellow oleomargarine may be freely sold in Arkansas, which establishes the same conditions that H. R. 2023 proposes to set up for the country as a whole.

An impartial fact-finding agency was retained to visit restaurants in Arkansas this spring, to learn whether, in the face of regulations which are similar to those now proposed by the oleo lobby, oleomargarine is being properly identified as such, and not passed off as butter. The firm's investigators called on 100 Arkansas restaurants scattered throughout the State. In not a single one of the restaurants so visited was there a sign of any kind on the walls, the menus, or the butter plates to indicate that olea was being served.

In every Arkansas restaurant thus visited, the investigator asked for butter, and paid for butter. Yet laboratory tests of samples collected by those investigators disclosed that, in 66 out of 100 of those Arkansas restaurants, the spread served was yellow oleomargarine, and not butter. That is flagrant fraud in complete and total disregard of the law's requirements. If the regulations touted by the oleo interests as being completely adequate to prevent fraud have failed so miserably in Arkansas, why should we assume that they would protect restaurant patrons elsewhere in the Nation?

On the basis of the survey just mentioned, it would appear that restaurant fraud is increasing rather than decreasing, and that oleo propaganda is responsible at least in part for inducing restaurant owners to believe that there is no real dishonesty in serving oleo in place of butter. Last year the dairy industry reported the results of a similar survey, which showed that only one out of three restaurants in a selected list of large cities was defrauding its patrons by serving yellow oleomargarine as butter, at butter prices. The 1949 results in Arkansas indicate that the proportion of fraud has probably doubled in that brief period of time. Those States which have let down the barriers against the sale of yellow oleomargarine have extended an open invitation to "butterleggers" to start gouging the public, and that invitation has been accepted.

The Pennsylvania Department of Agriculture reported the existence of widespread fraud at the time of the hearings before the House Agricultural Committee in March 1949. According to Miles Horst, secretary of agriculture of that State, no less than 153 out of 500 eating places recently checked in Pennsylvania were violating the law. Restaurant owners were either serving oleomargarine without licenses, or were mixing oleo with butter, or coloring the product illegally. Many had failed to post signs stating that oleo was being served, or used in cooking.

In his statement to the House Agricultural Committee, Mr. Horst opposed legalization of colored oleomargarine. If factory coloration were permitted, he said, the problem of protecting the consuming public would, without doubt, reach major proportions and extend beyond the power to control. That is the opinion of an experienced official, who is actually charged with the prevention of fraud, and whose conclusions are based on facts rather than on theories.

The press has also reported the existence of considerable restaurant fraud in Michigan. Naturally, these cases do not come as a surprise to the dairy industry. For more than 60 years the dairy farmers, together with public health officials and agencies such as the Food and Drug Administration, have carried on an unrelenting warfare against "butterleggers" of every size, shape, and description. The files of the Bureau of Internal Revenue are full of case histories resulting from their vigilance, but the oleo interests now maintain that fraud is a thing of the past. That is why I have confined myself in these remarks to only the most up-to-date evidences of consumer deception. I contend that recent violations in Arkansas, and in Pennsylvania, and in Michigan, clearly demonstrate that human nature has not changed. The temptation to easy profits is always hard to resist, and nowhere in the food field are there greater potential rewards for those who would practice fraud and deception than in the manufacture and sale of yellow oleomargarine.

Butter—real butter—can be identified at sight only by its naturally yellow color. Oleo manufacturers already imitate the size and shape of butter cartons, the style of butter packaging, and even the quarter-pound print to which the butter user has become accustomed.

There is no such thing as an imitation egg, for instance, or an imitation potato. No one could get rich by imitating a loaf of bread, or a bag of sugar. But butter is susceptible to this kind of unfair competition, which would be encouraged for their own gain by a handful of manufacturers who have already imitated everything else about butter except its naturally yellow color. The oleo interests have added artificial flavor to their product to make it taste like butter. They have added skim milk to give their product the texture of butter. They have added vitamin A in an attempt to approximate the nutritional qualities of butter, and they have imitated the exact size and shape of butter packages in an attempt to convince the unwary housewife that she is buying something just as good as butter. Now they demand the unrestricted right to imitate butter's exact color.

How can it be said, in the face of these clear evidences of intent to slip something over on the American public, or to encourage others to do so, that fraud will not be a factor if this Congress legalizes the unregulated manufacture and sale of yellow oleomargarine? In more than 60 years the oleomargarine manufacturers have never had the courage to develop a distinctive product of their own, and sell it on its own merits. Other food manufactured have managed to do very well with new products that were not patterned after any existing commodity. Peanut butter, for instance, has been successfully merchandised to the American public during the same years in which the oleomargarine manufacturers devoted all their resources to imitating butter.

No consumer has ever objected to the fact that peanut butter is not yellow like creamery butter. The dairy farmers have never objected even to the use of the word "butter" as applied to this product, because peanut butter is so obviously something so original and different, with a special appeal of its own, that no consumer could be deceived as to its true nature. Its manufacturers have never tried to make it spread like creamery butter, or taste like creamery butter, or smell like creamery butter—and certainly they have never wasted any time trying to imitate the naturally yellow color of creamery butter. Peanut butter deserves the success it has won on its own merits, just as oleomargarine would deserve any success it might win if it were advertised and sold as a unique product with special characteristics of its own. The trouble is that oleomargarine has never been sold on that basis; it has never been marketed as anything but a cheaper imitation of real butter, a phony synthetic substitute that tried to mimic the more obvious attributes of a genuine dairy product.

In a letter addressed to all Members of Congress, under date of July 20, 1948, Mr. F. W. Hoffman, president of the Cudahy Packing Co., had this criticism to make of his fellow oleomargarine manufacturers:

> During the past several decades the industry has encouraged rather than discouraged the consumer to take the time and trouble to color her oleomargarine yellow. All of the industry's advertisements have encouraged this practice. Had the industry, on the other hand, spent its millions of advertising dollars encouraging the consumer to serve oleomargarine white, she would probably have become accustomed to using it that way today.

Other industries in food, drugs, clothing, and shelter have gotten us to change our living habits without resorting to a complete imitation of competing articles, and the oleomargarine industry could and should do the same without imitating the color of butter.

Needless to say, Mr. Hoffman did not find himself in agreement with those of his competitors who were and are backing the propaganda drive to repeal Federal regulation of yellow oleomargarine. At the very opposite pole was the attitude of the John F. Jelke Co., which, as I have already mentioned, is now the property of Unilever, Ltd., of London, England.

In 1938 the Jelke Co. was served by the Federal Trade Commission with a complaint charging unfair competition in the sale of its products in violation of section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act. Through advertising in newspapers and magazines the John F. Jelke Co. was alleged to have represented that its oleomargarine was made from whole milk from which no part of the cream or butterfat content had been removed. The Government's complaint charged, however, that the company's oleo was in fact made from skim milk from which the cream or butterfat had been removed, and that the company's use of the phrase "fresh pasteurized milk" was wrongfully understood by consumers to mean whole milk, which was definitely not used by the oleo manufacturer.

The Federal Trade Commission further charged that the use of the words "churned" and "churnery" in connection with the phrases "fresh pasteurized milk" and "milk solids" led purchasers to believe that Jelke's oleomargarine was made from whole milk or from cream taken from whole milk. The complaint alleged that the company's product, in fact, did not contain any butterfat extracted from whole milk or cream by churning, as is done in the process of making butter, and that consequently the product was not "churned" in the sense that the term is understood by the public.

A further representation by Jelke in its advertising, to the effect that its product contained 43.8 percent more milk solids than the more expensive spreads—meaning butter—also annoyed the FTC. The Commission said that the oleomargarine manufacturer used the expression to imply that there was a substantial difference between the food value of its product and that of butter because its oleomargarine contained "more milk solids" than butter ordinarily contains. The Federal Trade Commission took the not unnatural stand that, since the quantity of milk solids in butter is about 1 percent, the presence of a mere 1.438 percent of milk solids in oleomargarine was scarcely a nutritional advantage. The presence or absence of milk solids in such a negligible quantity had no relation whatever to the food value of either butter or oleomargarine, the Commission pointed out.

Mr. President, if there is no danger of fraud in connection with the sale of yellow oleomargarine, what is the meaning of these incidents to which I have referred? The question has been raised that these frauds reflect merely a lack of enforcement. It seems to me that any such contention is brushed aside by letters from the Bureau of the Budget, and the Food and Drug Administration, to the effect that a single annual check of every eating place in the country would require the services of 960 Federal agents at a cost of $6,000,000 for the first year, and $5,000,000 a year thereafter, to enforce the restaurant provisions of H. R. 2023 alone.

Naturally, the dairy farmers of this country are not going to be satisfied to have Federal inspectors drop in on restaurant owners only once a year. They will urge, very properly, that such inspections should be carried out at least once a month. That would raise the cost of Federal enforcement to at least $60,000,000 a year, without offering much assurance even then that butterlegging would stop. Moreover, the oleomargarine laws in Pennsylvania restaurants have been and are being enforced, yet fraud persists. The violations found in Pennsylvania restaurants occurred in the face of widely publicized reports that Pennsylvania enforcement agents were cracking down. The number of restaurant owners who knew that the State agents could not possibly cover every eating place in the Commonwealth, and who took the chance of being overlooked, were the ones who were caught. That is human nature, as we discovered during prohibition days. But will the public think it is fun to be fooled when the cost of deception is double or more than double the true monetary value of oleomargarine?

"Butterlegging" can exist at any level of oleo distribution. It will occur on a wholesale scale if the final distinguishing feature between oleo and butter is removed. That distinguishing feature is, of course, the naturally yellow color of butter, which the oleo manufacturers now seek to imitate. Why do they want the unrestricted right to imitate that one particular color? There is only one logical reason—they want their product to look like butter as much as possible, so that it may be passed off for butter in public eating places, and on the home table.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I have already announced, Mr. President, that until I finish my speech, I shall not yield.

"YELLOW OLEO WILL BE CHEAPER IF FEDERAL REGULATIONS ARE REMOVED"

Next, we come to one of the most transparent of all oleo claims—a claim which would be merely amusing had it not already misled so many trusting housewives. In some respects I feel that propaganda to the effect that yellow oleo would be cheaper if only the Government would stop regulating it is less excusable than any other oleo argument, because it appeals to consumers in the low-income groups, who can least afford to be deceived. To hear the oleo interests tell it, they can hardly wait for the removal of present Federal taxes on yellow oleomargarine to cut its price by 10 cents per pound. Yet what are the facts of past performance in those States where yellow oleomargarine may now be freely sold?

Those facts are that the selling price of yellow oleomargarine in such States is more—much more—than the amount of the Federal tax would account for. Receipted sales slips and oleomargarine cartons collected from nine cities in as many States demonstrated before the Senate Finance Committee, only last April, that the difference in price between colored and uncolored oleomargarine was away out of line. The Federal tax on yellow oleomargarine, remember, is only 10 cents a pound. Yet sample purchases in those nine States showed that the mark-up on yellow oleomargarine over white was not 10 cents a pound, but 21.8 cents per pound, on the average.

Who was getting that exorbitant additional mark-up? Who is getting it now? Certainly not the farmer, who is forced to accept for his cottonseed or soybean oil whatever the two or three big refineries in the country choose to pay him. I have already said that it is the nature of big business to charge all the market will bear, and here we have clear-cut evidence of the truth of that statement. Moreover, it is only a forerunner of more extortion to come.

Mr. President, we have seen that the price of oleomargarine even now bears little or no relationship to the cost of its ingredients; that oleo is historically priced at about half the price of butter. A point which is frequently overlooked, however, is that one of the factors operating to keep oleomargarine prices down to even that level is the presence on the market of the uncolored product. In other words, if there were no white oleomargarine for sale, there would be nothing whatever to prevent the oleo interests from pricing the yellow product just far enough under the cost of butter to attract those customers who want to save a few cents regardless of quality.

Instead of costing half as much as butter, yellow oleo would then cost two-thirds as much, or even three-quarters as much. Dairy spokesmen believe that the elimination of white oleomargarine altogether would give the oleomargarine interests an opportunity to increase their profits by perhaps as much as $150,000,000 a year. Low-cost white oleomargarine is the competitor that the oleo interests fear most—not butter. Real creamery butter is a quality product which the oleo manufacturers can never hope to duplicate completely. Their whole objective is to produce a substitute which looks, tastes, and smells as much like butter as possible, but which can be sold on a price basis.

Everyone knows that yellow coloration adds nothing to the nutritional value of oleomargarine. Therefore, oleo manufacturers are forced to claim for white oleomargarine all the advantages possessed by the same product when colored at the factory. But not even the most gullible housewife would pay butter prices for something that looks like lard. So long as the market is flooded with white oleomargarine, which does not resemble butter, it is hardly feasible for these same oleo manufacturers to charge more than half the price of butter for a substitute made of vegetable fats.

Once white oleomargarine disappears from the market, however, that handicap vanishes. The oleomargarine interests will then be able to concentrate on their product colored yellow in outright imitation of butter, which means that they will be free to follow butter prices much more closely than they can now. In fact, State and Federal laws which encourage the sale of white oleomargarine are the consumers' one sure guaranty of continued low prices for substitute table spreads.

The housewife who believes that she will pay less for oleomargarine if the factory colors it for her is badly mistaken, as a simple calculation will show. The oleo advertisements state that it takes less than 2 minutes for her to color the white product yellow in her own kitchen. However, we have seen that in 9 different States yellow oleomargarine is selling for an average of 21.8 cents a pound more than the uncolored variety, although the Federal tax is only 10 cents a pound. If the housewife can save 22 cents in 2 minutes by coloring the oleomargarine herself, she is being repaid for her trouble at the rate of $6.60 an hour. That is a pretty fair wage scale for any operation.

It must be remembered, too, that many housewives never color their oleomargarine at all, because they use it for cooking or baking purposes and derive no benefit from the yellow color. If these housewives are forced to buy yellow oleomargarine at a premium, it is obvious that they will be paying extra for something they do not need or want. In its greedy grab for the table-spread market, the oleo lobby conveniently overlooks these simple fundamentals, while ruthlessly preparing to sacrifice the same low-income groups that it so loudly professes to serve. The cynical chatter about selling oleomargarine cheaper if only the Government would allow it to be colored yellow at the factory is a screen for exorbitant profits.

The possible scope of this fraud is on a scale worthy of the best legal minds of the giant corporations that have planned it. It justifies the outlay of millions of dollars in publicity, advertising, and propaganda that have produced new highs in cunning verbiage designed to confuse professional clubwomen and the paid representatives of consumer groups. It has warranted all the pressure put on newspapers and magazines, and all the money spent for hired writers and speakers. It has made worth while all the paid-for signatures on petitions, and all the stock letters and post cards sent to Congressmen by employees of the big food companies and their friends. It has produced a classic example of the use of semantics to make local creameries and small-town dairy farmers appear in the guise of a gigantic butter lobby, while the voice of a much more powerful oleo lobby is transformed into the dulcet pleas of seemingly aroused housewives.

The fact remains, however, that the last thing to be expected from all this activity is lowered oleo prices. Our own common sense tells us that the prodigal expenditure of millions of dollars, and the application of thousands of man-hours to publicity and propaganda for yellow oleomargarine, are not motivated by the desire to charge less money for the product, or to make a smaller profit from its manufacture and sale. The oleo interests clearly see an opportunity to monopolize the table-spread market, at their own price, and that price will be higher—not lower—than at present. Any other conclusion from the facts at hand is sheer nonsense. If there remains in the mind of a single Senator any last lingering doubt that this is true, I refer him to the hearings on cottonseed oil speculation conducted last summer by Representative AUGUST H. ANDRESEN, of Minnesota.

"HOUSEWIVES DEMAND YELLOW OLEOMARGARINE"

The oleo interests have long assured the Congress and various State legislatures that American housewives demand yellow oleomargarine. There is strong reason to believe that this assertion, like so many other misleading statements made by the oleo lobby to conceal its real objective, is a creation out of the whole cloth. The only survey of consumer preferences ever presented to congressional committees showed that a mere 23 percent of housewives believed color to be very important to oleo sales. Another 15 percent said they thought color was fairly important, but 62 percent of all consumers polled on this question said that color was not at all important to them. More than half of the women questioned said they would not object if oleo were colored some tint other than yellow or white.

It must further be remembered that only about 20 percent of our people use oleomargarine exclusively, whereas 32 percent—or half again as many—use butter and only butter for both cooking and table uses. It must remembered, also, that of all consumers who use only oleomargarine, the majority do not feel it worth while to color such oleo as they use for cooking or baking. Almost half of all consumers use both oleo and butter, and I need not tell the Senators which product goes on the table, and which is relegated to the kitchen.

It seems to me that these figures put the whole color question in its proper perspective, making it very evident that housewives have no real reason to demand the manufacture and sale of yellow oleomargarine on an unregulated basis. Certainly no housewife would demand anything of the sort if she thought that granting the oleo interests the right to imitate butter's naturally yellow color was going to imperil her supplies of meat, milk, and other dairy products. We have further evidence of the phoniness of this so-called demand in the way in which it has been expressed. State legislators and Members of Congress from all over the country have been bombarded by petitions from new and supposedly spontaneous organizations of women voters, all of which say they want yellow oleo. These organizations do not trouble to conceal the fact that they are hastily put together by professional propagandists skilled in their trade, and that they have large amounts of money available to assist housewives in making their so-called demands known.

In Ohio the chief lobbyist for the oleo interests, in an interview with the Columbus correspondent of a Cincinnati newspaper, openly admitted that he was paying as much as 10 cents a name for signatures to oleo-tax-repeal petitions. In many cases those signatures were obtained by newsboys, who thus increased their earnings while collecting from subscribers along their routes. Mr. President, I am the last to oppose free enterprise on the part of newspaper carriers, but I do not believe that the resulting oleo-repeal petitions were a true expression of popular sentiment.

In Indianapolis a well-known Representative was badgered almost to distraction by form letters demanding that he vote for repeal of oleo taxes, despite the fact that he was already on record as favoring removal of those taxes. When he replied to some of the women who had signed those letters, he received answers stating that they had never written the letters in the first place, and did not know what he was talking about. On further investigation it developed that the letters had been prepared by the local manager of Best Foods, Inc., a leading oleo manufacturer, who supplied the stationery, the typists, and even the stamps for this flood of useless correspondence.

A representative of the Association of Voters for Yellow Margarine in Ohio appeared before the Senate Finance Committee on behalf of 32,000 claimed members, the majority of whom, she said, were women. The hearings were held early in April of last year. Upon being questioned as to when her organization had been formed, however, this professional witness stated that it had been in existence only since January. It developed through further questioning by some of the Senators present that this group of some 32,000 members was what its spokesman called a "loosely formed, voluntary organization." It held no State or district conventions or meetings, passed no resolutions, and existed for no apparent reason other than to prepare oleo repeal petitions addressed to Members of the House of Representatives and Members of the Senate. Are we supposed to believe that so large a group could spring into being, full-grown for such a purpose, without the helping hand of the oleo interests, who thus choose to hide their selfish objectives behind various "front" organizations?

It has been called to my attention that oleo witnesses before the House Agricultural Committee were suspiciously lacking in spokesmen for the oleomargarine manufacturers themselves. The dairy farmers appeared in person, and spoke their respective pieces without hesitation. Four practicing dairy farmers were on hand, including one who is also a novelist and an internationally known authority on soil conservation—Louis Bromfield. One representative of organized dairy cattle breeders was there to tell the Congressmen what he thought the repeal of oleo regulations would do to his branch of the dairy industry. The dean of the largest agricultural college in Texas expressed the objections of the teachers of animal husbandry to the manufacture and sale of yellow oleomargarine.

The Secretary of Agriculture of the State of Pennsylvania outlined the practical problems of enforcement if "butterleggers" are to have access to unlimited supplies of oleomargarine colored yellow in imitation of butter. Two representatives of the butter manufacturers appeared, along with one representative of the organized dairy cooperatives, and one general representative of other branches of the dairy industry, as well as one operating dairy-industry executive from North Carolina. All of these men had perfectly self-evident reasons for being on hand to defend their industry against what they consider unfair competition. Two officials of the dairy labor union appeared, with forthright reasons for believing that their members faced the loss of jobs and income if oleo were allowed to imitate butter. That kind of self-interest is open and aboveboard, and any legislator understands and expects it.

Some labor-union representatives demand yellow oleomargarine, because the oleo interests have convinced them, wrongly, that repeal of Federal regulations will mean cheaper food bills for their members. Five paid representatives of professional consumer and women's organization demand yellow oleomargarine, because the oleo industry has spent millions of dollars telling them and their followers that yellow oleo is what the housewives ought to have. Soybean and cotton organizations have been persuaded to demand yellow oleomargarine in the hope of increasing the market for their oils, although there is no evidence whatever that domestic oils will continue to be used in oleo production. Retail and wholesale grocers expect to save time and trouble in making out Federal reports, and would be well advised to appear on the side of the dairy farmers, who now support them in this aim. By alining themselves with the oleo interests they have offended millions of farm families that are included among their best customers, and have additionally imperiled the incomes of those same farm families.

All the witnesses cited we can understand and excuse; they appear before committees because it is their business to appear before committees. That is what they are paid to do. But, Mr. President, it is still not clear to me why the oleo industry itself did not appear before the Senate Finance Committee in an open and forthright attempt to win the legislation it seeks. When giant corporations do not choose to work in the open, it well behooves the average American citizen to watch his pocketbook. When big business seeks to operate behind a screen of other groups, some of them formed solely to put over specific legislation and having no other reason for their existence, it is time to watch our votes as well.

"BUTTER IS ARTIFICIALLY COLORED"

Perhaps the most misleading of the oleo claims is that butter is artificially colored yellow, and that oleomargarine, in consequence, should have the same right to artificial coloring. This supposed argument has been particularly difficult to refute because it contains a germ of truth which dairy organizations have never denied. No dairy farmer hesitates to admit that a small proportion of the Nation's butter—about 20 percent at most—has color added. The oleo interests fail to mention, however, either the comparatively small extent of this butter coloration, or the reason for it.

In the wintertime, Mr. President, I have placed quite a few of the little bottles of butter coloring in the butter, after I finished churning it, and proceeded then to salt it. I colored it as I salted it, but I colored it in the winter months when we were feeding the cows on dry feed, which produces a much lighter-colored butter, but still a butter of decidedly yellow tint, than the rich yellow natural color of the butter in April, May, June, and July when the cows are foraging on the luscious green grass.

When color is added to butter it is for the sole purpose of uniformity—not to make the product resemble something which it is not, as in the case of oleomargarine. Butter is always yellow, and always has been yellow. Winter butter in the northern regions is, of course, somewhat less yellow than butter produced in the summertime when cows are feeding on green pastures. By the same token, our largest milk surpluses occur during those very months of the year when the grass is greenest, and consequently a very large proportion of our butter is produced from milk that is high in carotene content and very yellow in color.

Even so, there are certain regional preferences which must be kept in mind by butter producers, and these preferences occasionally call for modifications in the naturally yellow tint of the butter. Consumers in the South, for instance, like a butter that is so deeply yellow as to be almost orange. Housewives in the New England States prefer a very pale yellow butter, and their preference must be taken into account by the dairymen who supply that market.

The important thing to remember, however, is that all butter produced at whatever season of the year is yellower than any oleomargarine, regardless of the type of vegetable oil used in its manufacture. Our domestic vegetable oils cannot be made to produce a naturally yellow oleomargarine at all, according to the Armour Research Foundation of the Illinois Institute of Technology. The reason for this is that the naturally tan or brown cottonseed and soybean oils must be hydrogenated in order to turn them into fat. The hydrogenation process turns cottonseed oil into a pale gray-green substance, whereas soybean oil becomes a sort of tattle-tale gray when thus processed. These hydrogenated fats must then be bleached, not because of Federal laws but in order to remove undesirable odors, tastes, and colors.

Oleomargarine manufacturers have not the slightest basic claim to the color yellow, no matter how carefully we examine their operations. Even the orange coloration of palm-kernel oil, which oil must be imported and presumably does not meet with the approval of southern Senators who are legislating so wholeheartedly for oleomargarine, cannot be counted upon to carry through the hydrogenation process and lend a butter-yellow tint to the finished product. The palest winter butter is deeper in hue than any oleomargarine produced without artificial coloring.

Assuming that oleomargarine manufacturers were forced from the very beginning to bleach their product white in order to make it palatable, why did they then select yellow as the one color in the spectrum that they wanted to add to make it sell? A vast variety of jams, jellies, and other table spreads has been successfully marketed in this country in a multiplicity of colors ranging from the pale green of mint jelly to the deep purple of grape jam, all of them appetizing. The housewife has not discriminated against any of these products simply because they were offered to her in some color other than yellow. On the contrary, she has bought them in tremendous quantities.

Is it not possible that the oleomargarine manufacturers decided on yellow as a desirable color simply because that is the color of pure creamery butter? Is it not possible that the oleo interests have long sought, and still seek, to profit by the quality, reputation, and good will of local creameries through outright imitation of butter's naturally yellow color? Yes, Mr. President, those things are possible; they are, in fact, probable. But it is not possible to argue successfully that all oleomargarine should be colored yellow because a small percentage of creamery butter receives an even smaller proportion of artificial coloring.

"OLEO IS A FRIEND OF THE AMERICAN FARMER"

Now we come to an often-used argument advanced in certain quarters by the oleo lobby, to the effect that oleomargarine is a friend of the American farmer. The sponsors of this propaganda line point out that cottonseed oil comes from cotton; that soybean oil comes from soybeans; and that both cotton and soybeans are raised on farms, and must be classified as farm products. Having established these points firmly in the minds of their listeners, they then proceed to state that oleomargarine manufacturers buy cottonseed and soybean oils and consequently are friends of the American farmer.

The oleo spokesmen carefully omit any mention of the not-too-remote past, when the industry excused its use of cheap, imported palm and coconut oils by maintaining that a satisfactory oleomargarine could not be made from domestic vegetable oils. That dilemma was solved for them by farm representatives in the Congress, who erected tariff barriers against the importation of foreign oils produced by what amounted to slave labor. Immediately the oleomargarine manufacturers discovered that they could, after all, use our own American oils satisfactorily.

Before the war much, if not most, of our oleomargarine came from sources which helped the American farmer not one iota; but, on the contrary, contributed to the strength of big business corporations and international cartels which controlled the world markets in fats and oils. Now that the war is over, a considerable quantity of palm and coconut oils is once more reaching our shores and is being used in the manufacture of oleomargarine, despite the processing tax imposed for the benefit of our southern farmers.

There has been nothing whatever in all the arguments for repeal legislation advanced by the oleo lobby to indicate that domestic oils will continue to be used in their product. I have heard or read no statement emanating from the oleomargarine industry to the effect that foreign oils will not be substituted for American cottonseed or soybean oil whenever the market warrants, or whenever world prices sink low enough to justify it, or whenever the oleo interests decide that their own selfish aims will be better served by drawing upon the overseas plantations they control.

Meanwhile, it is worth remembering that every pound of butter displaced by a pound of yellow oleomargarine in 1947, fraudulently or otherwise, reduced the income of American agriculture by 46.9 cents. Farmers received only 12.8 cents from each pound of oleomargarine sold that year, but they received 69.6 cents from every pound of butter sold. Is it the work of a friend to take nearly 70 cents from the hands of American farmers every time a pound of oleo displaces a pound of butter, and to give only 13 cents in return?

Oleomargarine manufacturers argue that producers of soybeans and cotton would be greatly benefited by the unregulated sale of yellow oleo. This is not true, because little or no increase is to be expected in the price of cottonseed and soybean oils, and the reductions in dairy herds would deprive these producers of a significant portion of their market for cottonseed and soybean meals. The United States is in a fat-deficit position in normal times. Usually we import far more fats than we export. It was only during the war when the major copra- and coconut-oil-producing countries, the Philippines and the Netherlands East Indies, were under the control of the Japanese, that we exported more than we imported. Since the war we have again become a net importer.

Coconut, palm, and related vegetable oils from foreign sources in normal times establish, or certainly have a vast influence in establishing, the price of domestic vegetable oils. Industrial users of fats and oils shift their raw-material ingredients as price relationships warrant. Coconut oil is very competitive with cottonseed and soybean oil. Therefore, prices for cottonseed and soybean oil in this country will be held in a close relationship to the prices of coconut oil, due to their interchangeability of use. An increase in the prices of cottonseed and soybean oil relative to coconut oil, therefore, will merely cause an increase in imports of coconut oil.

Since cottonseed and soybean oil are sold on a flat-price basis, without regard to use, the oil used in edible products will bring no different price than that of the same grade going into inedible uses. This is quite unlike the dairy industry, where for many years the principle of classification according to use has been recognized. In view of these facts, it is obvious that cottonseed-oil and soybean-oil prices will not increase if restrictions on oleomargarine are removed. Any increase would cause an increase of imports in coconut oil and other foreign fats and oils. The net result, therefore, would be to increase imports of cheap foreign oils—not to increase prices to domestic vegetable-oil producers.

The world oils and fats supply is improving. In the Philippines production was retarded by 1948 by serious typhoon damage, but is again on the upgrade. Exports from the Dutch East Indies are increasing rapidly, although still considerably below prewar levels. United States production of the four major domestic edible oils—soybean, cottonseed, corn, and peanut—is expected to be about 10 to 15 percent above a year ago. The supply has improved to the extent that the Fats and Oils Committee of the International Emergency Food Committee has discontinued the allocation of world oils and fats supplies among importing nations. This amounts to official recognition on the part of the nations involved that the oils and fats shortage is at an end.

Thus, we have the peculiar state of affairs where an industry is asking the Congress, on behalf of the cottonseed and soybean producers, to pass legislation which will not benefit those producers. First, it will not result in any long-run increase in domestic vegetable-oil prices. The price of these oils is determined by the world price levels of competitive oils, the raw materials of which are produced by people with primitive living standards and, therefore, at very low cost.

Second, all of the cottonseed and soybean oil produced in this country is now finding outlets, and has for many years been finding outlets. There is no need to increase outlets which could not be filled by production of these oils. We should note that the production of soybeans and cotton is already heavily subsidized by the Federal Government under price-support programs. Is it wise public policy to encourage a legislative program which will, in the long run, merely increase importation of cheap foreign oils while at the same time subsidizing domestic vegetable oils through price supports?

Soybean oil was not very important until Government programs to encourage soybean production during the war were initiated to offset loss of copra and coconut oil from the Philippines and the Dutch East Indies. Further, we should note that dairy products are subject to price support. Is it wise public policy to drive down the price of butter through removal of oleomargarine regulation, which we would surely do, while in other legislation we order the support of butter prices through price-support programs? We would then have the unusual situation of the Congress forcing the reduction of prices on the one hand, and on the other hand demanding their maintenance through price support.

The only thing that could be done to dispose of such butter, except for small amounts for school lunch and relief programs, would be to dump it abroad or turn it into soap. This would be a most wasteful and uneconomic policy, and dumping would raise another confusing conflict in national foreign trade policy.

The reduction of dairy herds, which will be a longer-run result of the removal of regulation on oleomargarine, will diminish the market for one of the most important byproducts of cottonseed and soybeans. A reduction of 2,000,000 head in the national dairy herd, which I predict will follow removal of all oleomargarine regulations, will sharply reduce the demand for, and the price of, cottonseed and soybean meal.

With respect to the major cotton States, they stand to lose far more by a reduction in dairy production and prices than they could possibly gain from removal of oleomargarine regulations. In the 10 major cotton-producing States, the total farm cash income from dairy products and butter in 1946 was several times the farm value of cottonseed-oil production. The value of cottonseed meal sold to dairymen was actually greater than the value of cottonseed oil used in oleo.

"OLEO IS OPPOSED BY A POWERFUL BUTTER LOBBY"

Mr. President, I have already mentioned the fact that the oleo propaganda machine has managed to transform into a sort of ogre known as the butter lobby, some 2,500,000 individual dairy farmers. If that is what is meant by a butter lobby, we must also add 250,000 employees of dairy plants throughout the Nation, plus all the workers employed in the supply industries that serve the dairy industry. In all, it has been estimated that some 10,000,000 people derive their livelihood from the production and distribution of milk and milk products, and it is certainly true that all these people represent a considerable number of votes.

However, very few of the metropolitan newspapers, which delight in printing pieces about the butter lobby, seem to be aware of the existence of the much more powerful oleomargarine lobby with millions of dollars more to spend than dairymen ever thought of spending. The reports filed under the Federal Lobbying Act prove the existence of this oleo lobby, and demonstrate that it is considerably better heeled than the dairy and farm organizations that oppose it. The oleo lobby at its best, however, lacks one quality that is essential to the successful furtherance of legislation—it is not truly representative of either producers or consumers.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that I am very happy this afternoon to speak on the floor of the Senate as a representative of farm interests in respect to the problem before us. I shall be perfectly willing to defend before the people of my State any editorial attack that attributes to me being a part of a farm bloc. If fighting on the floor of the Senate of the United States for the protection of the best interests of the dairy farmers of the country, and thereby the best interests of agriculture generally, and thereby the best interests of American workers and consumers generally, is to subject me to the criticism that I am a spokesman for the farm bloc, I am happy to plead guilty, and I intend, so long as I serve in the Senate of the United States, to be one who can be counted upon to rise in defense of the best interests of the American farmer, because protecting the best interests of the American farmer is essential to protecting the best economic interests of American consumers generally.

I am happy also, Mr. President, to plead guilty this afternoon to being opposed to the oleo lobby, and the tactics they have used in the attempt to impose upon American consumers the type of imitation and misrepresentation that constitutes their stock in trade.

The millions of dairy-farm families in this Nation are both producers and consumers, as any small-town merchant or banker, or businessman, can testify. There are 3,500 local creameries in this country, scattered throughout all the 48 States, which turn the dairy farmer's surplus milk into butter, and give him a weekly check in return. Those creamery checks pay store bills in town, and any merchant can tell you how important that cash farm income is to the business life of his community. The dairy farmer is not only a seller but a buyer, and he does his buying in his own home town.

I have no way of knowing how many workers are employed by the five giant oleomargarine companies that do almost 70 percent of the oleo business, but I would venture to say they number only a few thousand. I am equally sure that the oleo plants where these people work are limited to comparatively few communities, perhaps 50 in all.

It is not possible for the small number of oleomargarine plants to influence very greatly the business communities in which they are located, any more than it is possible for the few thousand workers employed by those plants to contribute much to the buying power of the cities in which they live. The manufacture of oleomargarine, like the production of any other synthetic substitute, is highly mechanized and does not require much skill or supervision. A few workers turn a few valves, and a complicated assembly of tanks and pumps and mixers does the rest.

As would be expected, the unimportance of the human factor in this process is reflected in the percentage of return that goes to the farmers who supply the raw materials. That portion of the consumer's dollar that goes back to the cotton planter or the soybean grower is usually around 30 percent, and it is sometimes as low as 22 or even 21 percent. By contrast, almost three-quarters of the consumer's butter dollar goes back to the farmer, who sometimes gets as much as 80 percent of the retail selling price.

Under the circumstances, it is not surprising that millions of dairy farmers support their dairy and farm organization leaders in opposing the unregulated sale of yellow oleomargarine. Millions of small-town businessmen have equally important interests at stake, since they depend upon the farm trade for a large part of their turn-over. The teamsters' unions are active in defending butter outlets because the dairy industry is the largest user of motortrucks in the country. If people like these can be characterized as a butter lobby, then certainly we do have such a lobby and a very influential one.

Opposed to it, however, is the oleomargarine lobby, which certainly exemplifies the type of selfish big business determined to have its own way through the expenditure of unlimited funds. In my opinion, the oleomargarine manufacturers have mistaken power for influence. In a recent article on public relations, Fortune magazine pointed out that it is possible to have power without having influence, just as it is possible to exert influence without having power. It is a mistake for the oleomargarine interests to believe that the mere expenditure of millions of dollars will assure the results they want from Congress, just as it was a mistake for them to believe that our legislators would swallow without protest the absurd assertions which they have made throughout the course of their propaganda campaign.

Mr. President, we have seen that Federal oleo regulation is not restraint on free enterprise, as the oleomargarine manufacturers contend. We have disposed of their claim that oleomargarine will not harm the dairy farmer. We have seen that it is not possible for some of our largest dairy States to sell fluid milk, as the oleo lobbyists so glibly advise them to do. We have established very clearly that oleo spokesmen are wrong in stating that there is little danger of fraud in the manufacture and sale of yellow oleomargarine. We know that yellow oleomargarine will not be cheaper if Federal regulation is removed, because the oleo interests have demonstrated very clearly their continued intention to charge all that the market will bear for their imitation butter, if and when they are allowed to market it without restriction. We have reassured ourselves that housewives do not demand yellow oleomargarine, as its manufacturers claim; that the so-called demand for yellow oleo is a fabrication.

We have examined and discarded oleo arguments to the effect that, because a small percentage of butter is artificially colored, all oleomargarine should also have the right to the use of the color yellow. That contention, needless to say, is no better founded than the equally absurd claim that oleomargarine is a friend of the American farmer.

No one seeks to deprive the American housewife of oleomargarine; she ought to be able to buy all the oleomargarine she wants in its most economical, uncolored form, without the payment of any tax whatsoever. This is the stand taken by dairy and farm leaders, when the leading agricultural organizations voted for repeal of all Federal taxes on oleomargarine, provided some other way of restraining fraud and deception could be found.

The Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment undertakes to provide against fraud and deception on the basis of States' rights. In this it follows the precedent set by the Filled Milk Act of 1923, a measure designed to stop the widespread sale of a mixture of vegetable oils and skim milk as genuine evaporated milk. The Filled Milk Act of 1923 has been reasonably successful in restraining unprincipled manufacturers from imitating a genuine dairy product, and selling it to unwary consumers as such. This it does merely by prohibiting the movement of this questionable product in interstate commerce.

States which believe that it is all right for their low-income groups to purchase and use imitation dairy products are perfectly free to allow its manufacture and sale within their own borders. States which do not believe that unprincipled promoters should be allowed to mislead the public along such lines are at equal liberty to ban its distribution without being overwhelmed by imports from neighboring States. The Fluid Milk Act was passed almost unanimously by the Congress, and has twice been upheld by the United States Supreme Court.

Mr. President, I believe that we might well follow the pattern established by that piece of legislation in supporting the Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment, which undertakes to protect consumers and dairy farmers alike by banning interstate commerce in yellow oleomargarine. No hardship would result to oleomargarine manufacturers. No consumers who now buy and use uncolored oleomargarine would be deprived of the product. No State which now permits the manufacture and sale of yellow oleomargarine would be asked to restrain its distribution in any way. But—and this is a very large but—the great dairy States upon which we depend for so much of our milk and meat and other dairy products, would be protected against unfair competition from yellow oleomargarine with its consequent threat to their vital butter outlets. As a cosponsor of the Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment, I urge the Senate to provide this minimum of protection as the only practical solution to the long butter-oleo controversy.

RECESS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, January 13, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 12 (legislative day of January 4), 1950:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

James Michael McInerney, of New York, to be an Assistant Attorney General, to fill an existing vacancy.

COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS

John A. Marzall, of Illinois, now holding recess appointment, to the position of Commissioner of Patents.

IN THE MARINE CORPS

Maj. Gen. William P. T. Hill, United States Marine Corps, to be Quartermaster General of the Marine Corps, with the rank of major general, for a period of 2 years from February 1, 1950.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 12, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. D. H. Daniels, pastor, First Baptist Church, Hendersonville, N. C., offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, the Mighty Ruler of the universe, who dost from the throne behold all the dwellers on earth, we beseech Thee with Thy favors to behold and bless all those who make or interpret or execute our laws and so replenish them with graces of Thy Holy Spirit that they may always incline to Thy will and walk in Thy way; endow them plenteously with heavenly gifts.

As the nations of the world have their eyes focused and fixed on this Congress, give to all the Members of this body a defined and positive sense of their responsibility and wisdom to know the right and strength to do it. We pray that our laws may be so justly and so wisely administered that our Government shall be a living example to all lands, continue to hold these United States of America to a position of honor and trust among the nations.

We pray in the name of Him who said, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday, January 9, 1950, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, I may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes, and that, following my address, the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MULTER asked and was given permission to address the House on Wednesday next for 10 minutes following any special orders heretofore entered.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GOSSETT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. HÉBERT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article by William H. Fitzpatrick, editor, New Orleans States.

Mr. WIER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a news item appearing in the Minneapolis Star-Journal.

Mr. LARCADE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include newspaper articles.

Mr. PATMAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include statements and excerpts.

Mr. LANHAM asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial appearing in the Atlanta Journal.

Mr. MULTER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in five instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. MANSFIELD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and in two to include newspaper articles.

Mr. EBERHARTER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial appearing in the Pittsburgh Sun-Telegraph entitled "Why Congressmen Travel."

Mr. FORAND asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a bill he introduced on the extension of the unemployment-compensation program and an explanation of it.

Mr. TRIMBLE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous material.

Mr. BURDICK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include excerpts from newspaper articles.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. HORAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include letters.

Mr. RICH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include editorials.

Mr. LECOMPTE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a set of resolutions of the Wapello County Farm Bureau.

Mr. NICHOLSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter sent to him.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address by Herbert Hoover before the National Reorganization Conference of the Citizens Committee on the Hoover Report and over the National Broadcasting System on December 12 on the subject of removing obstacles to economy and to competence in government.

Mr. JAVITS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous material.

SPECIAL ORDER VACATED

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to vacate the special order he had for today.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the special order granted my colleague the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LODGE] for today may be put over until next Wednesday, or, if the House is not in session at that time, the immediately succeeding legislative day; and I further ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered, I may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

COAL SHORTAGE

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, although a national emergency exists by reason of the critical shortage of coal in this country, the President of the United States has thus far refused to act, although thoroughly informed as to the critical situation. He has thus far failed to perform his paramount duty to protect the health, the welfare, and the economy of the people, even though in no uncertain terms the Congress of the United States has given him the power so to do. Homes, hospitals, churches, schools, and factories are being closed.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the situation is so serious that the leaders of both political parties of the United States Senate and House of Representatives should call a joint meeting to devise ways and means making so clear to the President his duty as viewed by the Congress that at last he may be moved to act in relief of an emergency of which all the people are cognizant and which all suffer.

DR. TRUMAN'S DIAGNOSIS AND PRESCRIPTION

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Truman says our people are in bad health and need more medical attention, so he prescribes socialized medicine.

Dr. Truman says many of our people live in crowded shacks, so he prescribes public housing as a remedy.

Dr. Truman says our farmers do not know how to operate their farms, so he urges the Brannan plan to socialize and control the American farmer.

Dr. Truman says when our workers are out of work they do not get enough unemployment compensation, so he prescribes larger and more generous unemployment payments.

Dr. Truman says there is widespread ignorance in the country, so he prescribes Federal aid for education.

Dr. Truman says the States are unable and unwilling to secure civil liberties for their people, so he demands Federal laws to provide civil rights for all the people.

Mr. Speaker, what we really need is a new doctor who will prescribe less Government spending and lower taxes so that the people will have more of their money left in their own pockets to make their own welfare expenditures.

COAL SHORTAGE

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, last Monday a group of us, possibly 40 or 50 Senators and Members of this House, met with a group of retail coal dealers in the United States. We discussed the existing coal shortage, which is becoming increasingly acute and which is causing great hardship and suffering for thousands of innocent people.

At that meeting, and in the many letters we have been receiving from home, we have had presented to us persuasive and compelling evidence that the current strike in the coal industry imperils the national health and safety. Those present at the meeting agreed that the President should be formally advised of this fact and that he should be formally urged to invoke the national-emergency provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act.

To this end a committee, composed of Senator FERGUSON, of Michigan, the gentleman from Michigan, Congressman WOLCOTT, and myself, were designated to prepare an appropriate resolution. Such a resolution was prepared and was introduced in the Senate yesterday by the distinguished junior Senator from Michigan, joined with several other distinguished Senators.

I have today introduced an identical resolution in the House. Yesterday I sent each of you a mimeographed copy of it, together with an explanatory letter. I did not confine my communication to any particular section of the country or to the members of any one party. I sent it to all of you. While the acute coal shortage more severely affects some congressional districts than others, this grave national crisis is no less the concern of all of us. And, as I stated in my letter to each of you on both sides of the aisle, I hope that many of you will introduce a like resolution as an expression for the people of your district that you believe the President should exercise the powers vested in him by existing law to prevent a continuation of the current strike.

It may be that the President does not like the law we are asking him to invoke. But let me remind you that he has used the national-emergency provisions of it on nine previous occasions. It may be that some of you may not like the law. But let me remind you that on three separate occasions we voted for it with bipartisan support.

The coal-shortage situation confronting us today is as grave and as critical as the other instances in which the President invoked the law. In three of the nine instances in which the President used the power given him by the law, it was not even necessary to obtain a court injunction to settle the dispute. In one of the instances—that of the long-lines-telephone strike—it was not even necessary for the board of inquiry, set up by the President in accordance with the provisions of the law, to file a report. In the interim the strike was settled.

But in the case of the current coal controversy the President has not even so much as set up a board of inquiry, by which at the very least the facts in the dispute, including each party's position, can be ascertained. For reasons of his own, the President has ignored the existing situation, and we who represent the people owe it to the people we represent to indicate to the President the hardship and suffering our people are having to endure and to urge him to act.

That is the purpose of my resolution and the one introduced yesterday in the Senate by several Senators. I hope I may have the full support of all of you, on both sides of the aisle, in securing favorable action on this resolution. You can assist by introducing a like resolution and by urging the Committee on Education and Labor to report it immediately.

DEFENSE FACILITIES IN THE PACIFIC NORTHWEST

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, a few months ago the people of the Pacific Northwest were shocked beyond words by the announcement of the military that that area generally, and Puget Sound specifically, were vulnerable to enemy attack. The announcement proposed that thereafter a major portion of the aircraft construction would be transferred from the Boeing Seattle plant to the Wichita, Kans., plant.

The effect of such proposal was tantamount to the military's saying, "The Pacific Northwest is not adequately fortified to defend itself against enemy attack. You do not have sufficient defense installations. In the event of enemy action you would be vulnerable. Your people would be without adequate protection." The droppping of a bomb itself could hardly have startled the people of that region more.

Mr. Speaker, the result of the announcement of the military has been a call to arms to the people of the Pacific Northwest. They are thoroughly aroused. They do not intend to sit idly by and permit their region and themselves to be relegated to the position of expendables. They are perfectly willing to sacrifice themselves and everything they have in the defense of our Nation, but I assure you that they strenuously resent receiving insufficient consideration in the matter of adequate defense installations.

The people recall full well the contribution of their area during both world wars in the building of ships and planes, despite their so-called vulnerability. The record then established has been unsurpassed anywhere.

The announcement of the military is not without its implications. If the area is so vulnerable what will happen to those other industries which produce essential and militarily strategic supplies? Will they too be moved from the region? Not only is the personal security of the people involved, but their economic security and well-being also.

Removal of industries would bring widespread unemployment and distress to thousands of men and women. The effect upon the entire region would be calamitous.

Mr. Speaker, the solution to the problem of possible vulnerability lies not in the removal of industries from an area of such importance and size as the Northwest. It lies rather in the installation of adequate defense facilities. I confess that I am not a military expert, but it strikes me that if people must run from the Northwest in the event of another war, so also must they run from all of our coastal and border areas. In this day of guided missiles and modern long-range bombers, which section of the United States is more secure than any other? Every section is entitled to equal consideration and protection. I trust that the military will reconsider their decision.

SEGREGATION AND DISCRIMINATION IN THE ARMED FORCES

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, on December 22 last I wrote the Secretary of Defense that I would introduce a resolution seeking an investigation into the policies and practices of the Army, Navy, and Air Forces regarding segregation and discrimination and the steps which have been taken to carry out the Executive order of the President of July 1948, as well as the experience under the directive of the Secretary of Defense of April 6, 1949. Army Secretary Gordon Gray today announces yet further plans for dealing with this blight on our constitutional democracy in a most critical area, though the new directive has yet to be issued. His announcement emphasizes that the problem still persists a year and a half after the President's Executive order of July 26, 1948, and 9 months after Secretary Johnson's directive. The Congress should see that this problem is finally liquidated. I am accordingly introducing today the resolution for an investigation referred to in my letter of December 22, as it seems clear that Congress should at the very least oversee the liquidation of the problem of segregation in the armed forces and see that such segregation is finally brought to an end.

IMPORTS FROM COUNTRIES BEHIND THE IRON CURTAIN

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, from time to time I have spoken on the floor of this House against the practice of sending goods of strategic value to countries behind the iron curtain, notably to Soviet Russia, while spending billions of taxpayers' money to stem the march of communism and to arm our country against possible aggression by Communist forces.

It now appears that we are allowing imports from behind this same iron curtain that may cause loss to American farmers and workers.

My district contains some of the greatest onion-growing farms along the eastern seaboard. I hold in my hand a petition signed by 170 of these onion farmers protesting the entry of Hungarian onions into the United States.

These Hungarian onions are produced by slave labor under Communist rule and they can, therefore, be sold in this country for prices that may well ruin the onion farmers here. They have already had a serious effect on the price of onion futures.

I have taken this matter up with the Department of Agriculture and have written the Secretary of State a letter that I am placing in the RECORD.

I intend to fight this thing out to a finish and do all I can to see that the American farmer shall not be ruined and his standard of living be jeopardized by slave labor in the fields behind the iron curtain.

(The petition and letter referred to are as follows:)

We, the undersigned, citizens and farmers of Orange County, N. Y., do hereby protest the receiving in this country, by United States produce concerns, of Hungarian and Czechoslovakian onions, apparently put out by "slave labor" in Communist-controlled territory. We believe in competition, foreign and domestic, on the open market, but in view of the strained cold war relations between the United States and the iron-curtain countries, we feel that American dollars should not go to those nations.

A flood of iron-curtain onions on the market will have the eventual effect of reducing the market price for this type of vegetable—a situation which would be disastrous since this price has recently reached a fair level which enables American farmers to recuperate losses suffered during the low-price year of 1948. Furthermore, we may eventually find it impossible to compete with Hungarian and Czechoslovakian onions because—despite shipping and duty charges—they are selling as low as, or lower than United States onions. As we see it, the only way they could sell at such prices is by employing labor at starvation wages.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 9, 1950.

Hon. DEAN G. ACHESON,
Secretary of State, Department of State,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: For some little time I have been receiving protests from farmers and citizens of Orange County, N. Y., complaining about the entry into the United States of onions which were raised in Hungary and Czechoslovakia.

Orange County, N. Y., is one of the large onion-raising counties in the eastern United States and my people are apprehensive for the future of this bussiness in the face of competition from behind the so-called iron curtain. What started out as a mild breeze has developed into a hurricane from newspapers, chambers of commerce, and the people who till the soil.

I have been led to believe that recent arrivals of onions have had an adverse effect on the futures market. I further understand that although we have had a short crop of onions in the United States this past season, supply and demand are in fairly close balance.

I am writing you to ask whether or not the tariff on onions has been reduced since the end of World War II and if so, is this reduction accountable for these imports in competition with our American growers? Further, if this is so, can the situation be corrected administratively or does it require legislation?

Thanking you for your advice, I am,
Very sincerely yours,
KATHARINE ST. GEORGE.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McCONNELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address by Mr. Walter D. Fuller, president of the Curtis Publishing Co., on advertising and its effect on the welfare of the United States.

TAX CREDITS FOR HEALTH-INSURANCE PAYMENTS

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, no problem transcends in importance the health of our citizens. For that reason, any legislative suggestions on this subject deserve earnest study.

Federal grants for research into the causes and treatment of various diseases and physical ailments are now quite generally approved as proper and necessary expenditures in promoting the public welfare.

Health insurance is unquestionably desirable. It is when the element of compulsion enters that many shy away from the idea. To compel a man to take out such insurance and to say to him that a deduction will be made from his wages to pay for it, whether he wants it or not, is felt by many to be a curb on individual freedom of action, neither in conformity with our traditions nor designed to assure the accomplishment of the underlying objective—better health for a larger number of the American people.

Voluntary health insurance plans have recently made rapid strides of progress in our conutry. They are administered by public-spirited citizens who have given generously of their time and energy to develop them. As is true in most fields of activity, such private institutions are capable of rendering more efficient service than usually characterizes the operation of a Government agency.

If we can provide an incentive for more of our people to avail themselves of the advantages afforded by voluntary health-insurance plans, a real service can be performed without departure from traditional principles and without submission to the abhorrent development of centralization of more and more power and authority in the Federal Government.

Those who advocate compulsory health insurance supervised and directed from Washington are not all thirsters for power. Many of them are, of course. But others argue sincerely and plausibly that only the compulsory feature of health insurance can guarantee the achievement of the ultimate objective of better health for all, with which certainly no one can quarrel.

This thesis I am not prepared to accept. There is no evidence to support such a proposition. The experience with compulsory health plans in other countries convincingly demonstrates their ineffectiveness.

On the other hand, voluntary health-insurance programs have already met with notable success in this country. They should be encouraged in every legitimate manner.

In order to furnish an incentive for more of our people to subscribe for health insurance, I have today introduced a measure providing for a tax credit for premiums or subscription charges paid to obtain protection under voluntary plans already authorized under the Public Health Service Act.

Legislation has already been introduced in the other body to authorize an expense deduction in the income-tax returns for such premiums. While this is perhaps a step in the right direction, it is open to the objection that it grants the greatest relief to those in the highest income brackets who usually least need either the tax advantage or the benefits of health insurance.

The legislative suggestion which I have made proposes a credit against the tax rather than an expense or contribution deduction. In addition, in order further to encourage those who normally stand in greatest need of health insurance to participate in such a system, it is provided that the advantage of the tax credit shall be on a graduated scale, running from a credit of 90 percent of the amount paid for premiums for those with an adjusted gross income under $2,000 a year down to 60 percent of such premiums for those with incomes over $10,000 a year.

Objection will immediately be voiced to such a proposal by those who favor a centralized Federal control over all health systems that it would involve a great loss in tax revenue if large numbers subscribed for the plan. There is no doubt that tax revenues would be reduced. That is the very essence of the incentive involved in the program.

On the other hand, such a plan would relieve the Federal Government of the stupendous burden involved in setting up a huge medical bureaucracy and subsidizing all our citizens for medical expenses. In every country where compulsory governmental systems have been placed in operation the cost has vastly exceeded the estimates made when the plan was adopted. There is no reason to suppose that we are any exception. It may confidently be expected that those who seek to fasten socialized medicine on our people have yielded to conservatism when it comes to forecasting how much such a plan is going to cost.

In the long run the choice lies between an increase in the cost of government, an increase in taxes, less money in the pay envelope, and compulsion on the one hand, and a decrease in income taxes, more money in pay envelopes, and volition on the other hand. If substantially as good results could be achieved in bringing about better health for our citizens through voluntary means, certainly that is to be preferred.

The question is whether the real interest of the socialized medicine advocates is in building up another formidable Government agency and keeping taxes high or in expanding health insurance to protect more people.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts asked and was given permission to address the House for 5 minutes today following the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and the conclusion of special orders heretofore granted.

FORMOSA

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, during the war I was somewhat instrumental in securing your acquiescence in calling the heads of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps to appear before the Congress to tell us of the state of preparedness of the country and the state of the war.

I should like to request, Mr. Speaker, that at the present time you call the Secretary of State, Mr. Acheson, and the Secretary of National Defense, Mr. Johnson, before the Members of the House—perhaps not in the Chamber, because that probably cannot be done—but, in any event, to appear before the Members of the House to tell us what they consider to be the importance of having our forces in Formosa and what they consider the value to our national defense is in Formosa. It is a vital matter today to every Member of Congress and to every person in the United States.

It is vital to democracy to those who paid the price in blood, sweat, and tears because of unpreparedness and unwise foreign policy. The American people should know before it is too late whether our interests are being fully protected.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COLE of New York (at the request of Mr. ARENDS) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

YANKEE BOY MAKES GOOD IN DEEP SOUTH

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON of California Mr. Speaker, things are tough all over. Strange things are going on in this country. The solid South is beginning to crack. In fact, that bastion of the southern democracy which lies south of Mason and Dixon's line is falling apart at the seams—a Republican has gotten a job in Alabama.

As proof of what I say, Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a letter addressed to the distinguished minority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN]. It is as follows:

SHERIFF'S OFFICE,
MOBILE COUNTY,
Mobile, Ala., January 1, 1950.

DEAR FRIEND: It is a real pleasure to hand you herewith your 1950 deputy sheriff's commission card.

In order to complete our file we ask that you return the enclosed information slip. This will also insure the prompt issuance of your 1951 card.

May the New Year bring happiness and peace to you and yours.

Sincerely,

W. H. HOLCOMBE,
Sheriff.

Now, can you beat that?

Mr. BOYKIN. Will my friend from California yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I yield.

Mr. BOYKIN. If we must have a Republican in Mobile, Ala., I would rather have JOE MARTIN than any man in this world. He is one of the greatest Americans I have ever known.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I realize we must all make an humble start. Great oaks from little acorns grow. I want the people of Alabama to know that I appreciate their generosity and assure them that I will not, in my zeal, attempt to work in two different positions at the same time.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of California. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Suppose any of us happened to be going through that part of Alabama where my friend has been made honorary deputy sheriff, will the gentleman from Massachusetts guarantee us that if we are exceeding the speed laws he will take care of it?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Massachusetts realizes that no Member of the House would violate any law.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. D'EWART asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. RIBICOFF (at the request of Mr. SADLAK) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SADLAK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. HARVEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a letter from a constituent.

MILK PRICES IN NEW YORK

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I have always had the greatest desire to see the people of New York City and all of the other great metropolitan areas supplied by the New York milk shed, fed well and fed properly. The Federal Government, however, through the Federal milk marketing law, which covers our particular section of the Northeast, gave us all a death blow when, for the first 3 months of this year 1950, they gave an order that the milk price to producers of fluid milk should be knocked down 44 cents per hundredweight. I say it jeopardizes the very nutrition of the people of our great cities, and I for one want to protest against it loudly.

I do not like to see the dairymen of the Northeast go into bankruptcy. I am introducing a resolution at this time which will raise the milk price to these producers to $6 for every 100 pounds of milk they sell. This action will save a hundred thousand family-size dairy farms from the sheriff and will guarantee proper food for the people in the city.

The Hall resolution reads as follows:

Whereas dairy farmers of the New York milk shed are unable to meet their costs of production with prices of fluid milk at their present levels; and

Whereas the current shortage of hay and fodder due to the recent drought constitutes an additional burden upon them; and

Whereas the producers of dairy products within the New York milk shed are faced with growing hardships due to low income; and

Whereas the people of large metropolitan areas are dependent upon these family-size dairy farms of the New York milk shed for proper nutrition: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Congress hereby directs the Federal Milk Marketing Authority to raise the price paid to producers of fluid milk to at least $6 per hundredweight.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. VAN ZANDT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial from the Altoona Tribune, of Altoona, Pa.; and also to extend his remarks and include a speech delivered by him before the Poultry Men's Association at Harrisburg.

Mr. LATHAM asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and to include extraneous material.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR., asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address by Dr. Edwin A. Cottrill, notwithstanding the fact that the matter exceeds the usual amount allowed in the sum of $287.

SELFISH INTERESTS

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, I note in the recent state of the Union message that the President has omitted his usual reference to selfish interests. I always thought the President did not know a selfish interest when he met one, but I have come to the conclusion that perhaps he has given some thought to the matter. Perhaps he has been giving thought to the fact that one man can say who shall work and for how long in the coal mines in this country; that one man can say how many railroad trains shall run from one point to another; and perhaps that one man really ought to be called a selfish interest.

Perhaps he has in mind another man who can throw a blockade around the Hawaiian Islands off the mainland. Perhaps he realizes that that, too, constitutes a selfish interest. Perhaps there is hope for Mr. Truman. If there is, then indeed there is hope for the country.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.] has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. NORBLAD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in two instances, in each to include extraneous matter.

Mr. HESELTON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an address by Miss Grace Humphrey.

Mr. FARRINGTON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a committee report.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

Mr. PHILBIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement and excerpts with regard to three different matters.

Mr. MURDOCK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous material.

Mr. ELLIOTT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution passed by the Henderson County, Tenn., Farm Bureau and a letter from Mr. John H. Phipps.

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an address he made recently in Fredericksburg, Va.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include therein a letter from the Department of Agriculture and also a newspaper article from the Washington Times-Herald.

Mr. BIEMILLER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

Mr. BROOKS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to include an editorial.

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a letter voicing my love and respect for you, as I did not get to attend your birthday party.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHEPPARD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an article.

THE COAL SITUATION

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to extend my remarks, and to include therein a joint resolution I am today introducing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, like other Members of Congress, I am receiving many complaints from the constituents whom I have the honor to represent setting forth the distressing condition in their communities because of the impossibility to secure sufficient coal to heat their homes, their schools, and public institutions, their hospitals, and their churches. In addition, I am receiving telegrams and letters from manufacturers and operators of industries, some reporting that their coal supply is entirely exhausted, others that they only have enough coal to continue for a few days, and all appealing to the Congress to do something about it.

Here is a sample of a telegram just received:

We are in dire distress for coal in our community. The supply in Adrian is exhausted. Congress should get busy today and have miners back at work at once. Investigate afterward. This is not only an emergency but disaster is approaching. Please do something about it.

People do not seem to realize the Congress makes the laws and the executive departments execute and enforce them. There are already on the statute books adequate laws to permit the President to take action to the end that the prayers of the people be answered, and that coal be provided in the public interest. This question is not merely a commercial one. Human rights and even human suffering are involved. In the section of the country from which I come, it is cold in the winter. The average home is equipped for coal heat. Gas, oil, and wood are impossibilities in these homes at this time. The weather is turning rapidly colder, and a few days of zero weather will cause terrible suffering, much sickness, and probable death in many cases.

This is no time to toy with words, to play politics, or to try to escape responsibility because of technicalities. Affirmative and decisive action is essential on the part of the President. Joe Stalin may control Russia, but John L. Lewis must not be permitted to control the United States. The Taft-Hartley law may have its defects, but certainly it contains language giving ample authority to the President and the executive agencies to intervene in behalf of our people and put an end to this emergency which is not only already a calamity but, in many instances, disastrous.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] has just announced the introduction by a number of Senators and Representatives of a concurrent resolution indicating that a national emergency does exist. I have read that resolution carefully and do not believe it goes far enough. I am, therefore, introducing today a concurrent resolution amplifying and strengthening the Church resolution.

In my opinion, the emergency is presently upon us and, while the Congress cannot enforce the laws now available to the President, it should in clear, definite, and concise language express its views and at least request the President to do something about it.

My resolution will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor—pursuant to the rules of the House—and I hope that committee will give immediate consideration not only to this resolution, but to all similar resolutions, and report favorably to the House in keeping with the necessities of the occasion and the demands of the hour.

My resolution reads as follows:

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

Whereas the current strike in the coal industry is imperiling the national health and safety; and

Whereas there is not sufficient coal above the ground and available for fuel purposes to meet the minimum requirements of the people of the country for heating purposes; and

Whereas factories are being compelled to close; people thrown out of employment; wage earners deprived of the right to provide support for their families and heat for their homes; and

Whereas the threat to national health and safety is increasing hourly, as evidenced by calls of distress from many parts of the country; and

Whereas there already exists legislation authorizing the President to act under such circumstances to protect the national health and safety: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the President of the United States should, and he hereby is requested to, invoke the national emergency provisions (secs. 206 to 210, inclusive) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, in the current strike in the coal industry.

COTTON ACREAGE ALLOTMENTS

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and to include therein some letters and clippings with reference to the cotton quota allotments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, irrespective of the percentages which people tell you about, insofar as the cotton-acreage allotment is concerned, the important thing with reference to every cotton county in this Nation is how many acres of cotton allotment it, the individual county, has. If it has enough acres this is fine, if it does not have enough, how many does it need? I certainly wish that every interested Member of Congress would find out from his own State PMA committee just how many additional acres, if any, his counties will receive under the proposed Cooley amendment, the one the gentleman from North Carolina, Representative COOLEY, introduced January 3, House Joint Resolution 384. It will be enlightening and it will be interesting.

I have a letter dated January 10 about the resolution, House Joint Resolution 384, to remedy this cotton-acreage situation. Here is what the writer states: He is the secretary of the Rusk County, Tex., PMA county committee.

If Resolution 384 goes through as now written, it will be very damaging to the farmers of Rusk County.

That is Rusk County, Tex.

A 20-percent sample of 2,550 farms affected by the allotment was tabulated with the following result: 1,347 acres would be the increase, of which 160 farms would receive less than 1 acre; 295 farms would receive the balance. This would leave 2,090 farms receiving less than their original 1950 allotment.

Find out about your counties, those of you who are interested.

Please note specifically what is said about House Joint Resolution 384, the resolution introduced by Mr. COOLEY to amend the cotton quota law:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Henderson, Tex., January 10, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
United States Congressman, Third District, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will acknowledge your letter of January 6, 1950, relative to the cotton allotments in Rusk County. We also received a copy of House Joint Resolution 384.

The copy of Judge Selman's telegram attached to your letter states the situation in Rusk County the same as it applies to Houston County. If resolution 384 goes through as now written, it will be very damaging to the farmers of Rusk County.

A 20 percent sample of the 2,550 farms receiving an allotment was tabulated with the following results:

One thousand three hundred and forty-seven and one-half acres would be the increase, of which 160 farms would receive less than 1 acre and 295 farms would receive the balance. This would leave 2,095 farms receiving less than their original 1950 allotment.

This penalty to the bulk of the cotton farms would be a direct result of an arbitrary adjustment of the planted history by the county committee in order to meet the figures of the BAE.

We have 2,105 other farms which do not have a planted history for 1946, 1947, or 1948 but many of them did grow cotton in 1949. There is a reserve of 1349.7 acres set up for new growers. We have over 100 applications for "new grower" allotments and more coming in every day. It is estimated there may be as many as 900 in all.

Respectfully yours,

B. A. DINWIDDIE,
Secretary, Rusk County PMA.

MOUNT PLEASANT, TEX., January 10, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This acknowledges your letter of January 3 and January 6, and also House Joint Resolution 384.

Please be advised that for new grower allotments here in Titus County, we have approximately 171 acres available, and it looks like that it will be close to 100 such farms requesting new grower allotments. Such being the case, it would take at least 500 acres to give these farms 5 acres each, many of which though, must have 10 to 15 acres in order to carry on the type farming program that will be necessary for them to support their families and meet commitments that have already been made.

As to my opinion of the House Joint Resolution 384, I don't believe that it will help but very little here in Titus County. You will remember that we were required to come within BAE figures before we could start figuring cotton allotments, and here in Titus County, this meant that practically every farm, and especially the cotton farms, had to have the acreage reduced in order for the county to come within the BAE figures. In some instances, in order to get within this BAE estimate, it was necessary to reduce the reported acreage to zero. My sincere opinion of legislation that would benefit most would be the permission to take released acreage and reapportion it out to those farms that need additional acreage, and to give the county credit for war crops in the same proportion as each farm has already received credit for war crops. To illustrate how giving the county credit for war crops would benefit such a county as Titus County, I would like to advise you that of the 1,160 Group I cotton farms 816 of these farms received all credit or partial credit for war crops, yet the county did not receive credit for any war crops. This then reduced the factor, which in turn meant that the real cotton farmers in the past were the ones that received the largest cut. In fact, the factor for this county is .1339, which means that if a farm had as much as 13.4 acres planted in cotton in any one of the years 1946, 1947, and 1948, and the farm had 100 acres of cropland, the farm would not be allowed but 13.4 acres, even though on such a farm the records show that the farm had been consistently planting 40 acres or more of cotton. To be sure, such farms as shown above were given all of the assistance by the committee that was permitted under the small acreage available for adjustments, and bear in mind, that the acreage available for committee adjustments was slightly over 1,000 acres, and there were 1,160 farms eligible for cotton allotments.

I hope this gives you the desired information.

Yours very truly,

HARRIS A. GREEN.

Note why no higher percentage was reserved by the State committee:

COLLEGE STATION, TEX., January 11, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Less than 10 percent of State cotton allotment was reserved by committee for the reason that it was felt that the amount reserved was enough to take away from the stable cotton-producing area of Texas. Details relative to studies made by committee too voluminous to wire.

CROCKETT, TEX., January 3, 1950.

Representative LINDLEY BECKWORTH,

Houston County 1942 cotton acreage 72,000; 1950 acreage 26,000. Met with B. F. Vance, chairman, State PMA committee today. Cy Heaton was present and we decided an amendment setting up 70 percent of the farmers actual acreage in 1946–47–48 would alleviate our troubles but if the BAE figures are used we would be hurt still worse than we are as it is now.

ROY SELMAN, County Judge.

I desire to include a number of communications:

STEPHENVILLE EMPIRE-TRIBUNE,
Stephenville, Tex., January 7, 1950.

DEAR LINDLEY: I have read with considerable interest your discussion of the farm allotment program on the floor of the House the past week.

The farmers of this section of Texas are badly demoralized. Moreover, they are not at all pleased with the way this plan is working nor in the way it is being applied.

I wish to commend you for the constructive manner in which you are seeking to correct this very impractical plan.

All good wishes for the New Year.

Sincerely,

RUFUS HIGGS.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
Palestine, Tex., January 10, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Congress, Third District, Texas, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This acknowledges receipt of your letter of January 3, 1950, and it is indeed a pleasure to give you the information that you ask for concerning the portion of allotment reserved to take care of the old cotton farms and the new-grower farms.

An old farm, according to the interpretation in CMQ program, means any farm that had cotton planted on it in either of the years 1946, 1947, 1948, or was regarded as having cotton planted on it by having war crops planted in 1946 or 1947, provided such farm had cotton planted on it in 1941 and decreased the cotton acreage in these 2 years and increased the war crop acreage. In this group we have 200 acres in the reserve to take care of corrections, lates, and reconstitutions.

A new-grower farm, according to the interpretations in the CMQ program, is a farm that did not have cotton in either one of the years 1946 through 1948 or was not regarded as having cotton in the year 1946 or 1947. We have 800 acres in the reserve to take care of such farms and we will likely have as many as 300 applications for this acreage.

We farmers call an old cotton farm one that grew cotton regular prior to the war, but, for various reasons, such as shortage of farm labor, lack of equipment, and the urge to go to defense jobs, etc., caused the farm to loose its cotton history, and 90 percent of the farms that are asking for new-grower allotments are just such farms.

Our regular cotton farms only got 9.55 percent of the total cropland in this county, which is a thing we cannot figure out how to live with.

If we can furnish you with further information we will be too glad to do so.

Yours very truly,

HOMER D. KILLION,
Acting Secretary, Anderson County PMA.

YANTIS DRUG CO.,
Yantis, Tex., January 5, 1950.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: I read your card and papers in regard to the cotton acreage reduction this morning. I read all of them and I imagine it is like some of them stated. This is the counties that were the poorest for agriculture. More people left and went to the Army and to defense work, thereby cutting down the cotton acreage in those counties during those years like Wood County and some other East Texas counties but now since the people have come back to the farm and want to farm, I think this all should be considered and each farmer given a reasonable number of acres for cotton.

I guess you know what they mean when they say a county has, or is allowed, a certain factor. I believe they claim this county's factor is 12. I think that means 12 percent of the acreage in farm. While some other counties' factor is much higher.

It looks like they have just about figured the farmers in this county out of a cotton crop which will almost put some of them out of business. I don't see much use in the Government supporting the price on cotton and then cut the little farmer out of cotton acreage to produce the cotton; this is supporting the price and then not allow them to produce it. To support the price, I know there should be a reduction made but I think this reduction should be fair to all and I feel that you will do all in your power to get it adjusted this way. I imagine the counties in your district are hit harder than any.

Thanks for your reply and will appreciate hearing from you again.

Your friend,

J. O. MCCREIGHT.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,

DEAR SIR: I have been raising 20 to 25 acres of cotton. The farm was sold and we moved to the edge of town paying $45 per month on house there cash rent and my cotton and corn land rent done paid. Yet they won't let me plant any cotton at all because the land are weed land not in cultivation for 7 years. Yet my old farm was bought for a stock farm; there be no crop of any kind on it. Can I live at that. I wanted 15 acres cotton. My average cotton crop about 22½ acres.

A friend of yours. Thanks to you.

HENDERSON, TEX., January 5, 1950.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: I am writing you in regards to the cotton quota on my farm 132 acres, and they only allowed me 8 acres of cotton. How can a widow woman with two grandchildren live on what one-fourth an 8 acre of cotton makes? I am not physically able to work or to help as I have high blood pressure and gall bladder trouble, and I will be 62 in June. The grandchildren are very small and can't get any job to help. At present they are both in school. Their mother is dead and their father helps what he can, but he is out of work lots. You have told me if you could ever be of any help to me you gladly would do so and I have all the confidence in the world in you. I feel like you will help if you can. Several told me to write you. As you know I am very dumb in this as my husband always saw after this business. I helped him all I could but he saw after the farm. I was in hopes I could get enough cotton to help me get the tax straight on our home. I have had so much on me this past year. I could not straighten them out as my husband and I had planned before his death in May. If you can help any way on getting this cotton acreage raised I will surely appreciate it as I feel so blank about it all. I just know I need all the acreage I can possibly get.

I hope you and yours had the merriest Christmas and a very prosperous New Year.

Your with best wishes.

Mrs. MARVIN GRAY.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 10, 1950.

DEAR MR. BRANNAN: I quote the pertinent part of a letter I have received from Mr. A. M. Mainer, route 3, Carthage, Tex.:

"If this acreage allotment is forced on, thousands of farmers will go to the relief rolls. I have a neighbor that hadn't planted any cotton since 1944. He has one son—a war veteran come back from overseas—has a wife and little baby girl and now has another little girl. This young man bought a tractor last spring and farmed his father's farm and made around 30 bales of cotton. They gave him an allotment of 5 acres. Do you think he can survive as a farmer? As ever your friend."

Any help you can give concerning this matter will be appreciated by Mr. Mainer and his neighbor. Your suggestions I'll welcome.

Sincerely,

LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I have requested the Library of Congress to assist me in preparing a list of counties that have more cotton acreage in 1950 than they had in 1942. I include the part of the work which has been completed:

Cotton Belt counties with more cotton acreage allocated in 1950 than in 1942

I desire to include clippings from the Tyler Telegraph of January 5 and 9, 1950:

BECKWORTH ASKS AID FOR STATE'S COTTON FARMERS

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 4.—Representative LINDLEY BECKWORTH, Gladewater, spent 30 minutes Wednesday with Secretary of Agriculture Charles Brannan, outlining for him in detail the desperate plight of Third District cotton farmers.

BECKWORTH said afterward that the Secretary listened with sympathetic interest and while he could not commit himself to any course, the Congressman feels that it was worth while to give the Cabinet officer a first-hand account.

BECKWORTH told of the plight of war defense workers and veterans who have been classed as new farmers and thus have no cotton history to get greater allotments.

He said in some sections of the district, each farmer had but 3 acres to plant. Because of poor soil, this might produce less than a bale. In Panola County, there are 1,000 acres to be divided among 1,300 farmers if all elect to grow cotton.

There seems no chance for change in the Agriculture Department's present interpretation of existing law.

"Something must be done," said BECKWORTH, looking hopefully to amending the law.

Much evil will come from this piece of legislation. If the Government won't let folks work and earn a living, then it can just expect to feed them.

BECKWORTH put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD Tuesday for all House Members to read a comparison county-by-county of 1942 allotments with the present and these show in some instances an 80 percent cut in east Texas, whereas counties like Lubbock in west Texas have double their 1942 allotment.

COTTON ACREAGE FIGHT LOOMS IN WASHINGTON—CONGRESSMEN FROM BOTH EAST AND WEST TEXAS DECLARE LAW UNJUST

WASHINGTON, January 8.—Texans cannot "let dog eat dog" on the question of county cotton acreage allotments Representative KEN REGAN, Midland, Sixteenth District Congressman, has declared in calling for all-out coordination of effort among Congressmen and cotton leaders.

REGAN'S statement was believed more significant in view of the fact he comes from one of the three districts in the State which stand to benefit from the new county acreage allotment law.

"We cannot let the little farmers of Congressman LINDLEY BECKWORTH'S district in east Texas suffer and lose their land," said REGAN. "We have to take some from the counties that got the big allotments and give some to the counties with lesser allotments."

REGAN said he does not see why it could not be possible to scrap all the confusing formulae and gadgets and county factors used in figuring county and individual allotment and give everyone a straight across-the-board 30 percent cut on 1949 production.

Representative W. R. POAGE, Waco, member of the House Agriculture Committee, said this is not possible because the House had voted last year that 1949 production would not apply to 1950 allotments.

REGAN answered, "Well, what's that old eraser put on the end of a pencil for if we all don't make mistakes? Let's wipe out that act of 1949, which was a mistake, and write a new one."

Other than REGAN'S proposal, the Texas delegation in Congress seems to be without any definite plan.

Following Representative BECKWORTH'S conversation with Secretary of Agriculture Charles Brannan, in which BECKWORTH set forth the desperate situation of small farmers in east Texas, BECKWORTH said the Department denied it had been asked to express its views, formally, by the House Agriculture Committee before the bill was reported out.

Department officials denied that they were to blame for the legislation and said in the form in which it was passed their solicitors could do nothing else but interpret the law the way they have.

Congressman POAGE said emphatically that promises of Agriculture Department officials as to how the law would apply had been broken. Deputy Administrator Frank Woolley, of the Production and Marketing Administration, had promised POAGE that Texas might get credit for her war crops but now she does not.

BECKWORTH said: "One thing is certain. If the Government is not going to let these farmers in east Texas earn a living, it is certainly going to have to feed them."

BECKWORTH warned that many tenant farmers in east Texas would have to get off the farms where they are now living. He mentioned Panola and Smith Counties in particular but put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a comparison of allotments of all counties in the State for 1950 and 1942.

This shows some east Texas counties being cut to 3 acres to a farm while some cotton farmers of west Texas are getting double their previous acreage.

Farmers are remaining on farms now in the desperate hope that the law will be changed, he said, but come spring, there will be no alternative but for families to move on, and where will they go, he asked.

"This cotton law was written for the big interests," said REGAN. "Now they selfishly want to perpetuate these benefits which they have received."

Also I desire to include some items from the Dallas News:

UNFAIR COTTON QUOTA

To the NEWS:

This cotton-acreage bill has ruined me with my farming. I have a wife and 10 children to support, and cotton is my only cash crop. I have a 100-acre farm. I have been planting between 35 and 45 acres of cotton for the last 6 or 7 years, except during the war years when I planted war crops such as beans, potatoes, peanuts, and anything that we eat.

I think this cotton bill is the worst thing that has ever happened to a cotton farmer in east Texas. It is very unfair. I have one girl taking a business course and my next to the oldest child is finishing high school this year. I have five more in school, which makes a total of seven. It is impossible for me to make a living for them and educate them on 7.2 acres of cotton, which is all I'm allowed.

I know of farmers all around me who haven't been raising cotton, and they have got more acres in cotton to plant than I have. They do not have more than a wife and two children. I need at least 25 acres of cotton to support my family and educate my children. I think we should have a cotton quota, but I think it should be cut equal.

ZAN R. MAY.

JOAQUIN, TEX.

PMA SECRETARY STUDIES COTTON ACREAGE BILL

LUFKIN, TEX., January 7.—The 70–50 cotton-acreage allotment bill introduced into Congress Tuesday may do Angelina County farmers more harm than good, Leon Pledger, secretary of the Angelina County Production and Marketing Administration, said.

A survey of 80 farms in the county, made on a basis of probable effect of the 70–50 bill, showed that only 10 of the farms would get an increased allotment in cotton acreage, Pledger said. The other 70 farms would get cut back more than they are under the present plan, he declared.

Under the proposed bill, no cotton-acreage allotment would be less than the larger of (1) 70 percent of the average acreage actually planted to cotton in 1946, 1947, and 1948, or (2) 50 percent of the highest acreage planted in cotton or regarded as planted in cotton in any of the 3 years.

TEXAS FARMER'S PLIGHT SHOWS JOB FOR CONGRESS

Every Texan should read Zan R. May's complaint in the Letters From Readers column on this page. Injustices reported by Mr. May are typical of those inflicted on thousands of Texas farmers by the cotton-marketing quotas. Mr. May's cotton acreage has been cut by law from 45 to 7⅞10 acres for 1950. He has received no credit for cotton acreage he diverted to war crops. Neighboring farmers who have not been growing cotton, nevertheless, have received cotton acreages for 1950. Yet Mr. May cannot take over any of his neighbor's allotments if they decide to continue to farm without planting cotton.

Mr. May's hurt has come from the manner in which the present law is applied. His county's acreage was not prorated justly among cotton farmers. On the contrary, it was prorated among all farmers—on the basis of tillable acres. Under the law, this procedure will result in loss to cotton of thousands of acres, because these acres will go to farmers who do not intend to use them. And these acres, be it noted, will be lost from the State and National allotments. They are not excess acres whose cultivation would contribute to cotton surpluses.

This is the sorry mess that Congress must clean up this month. No time can be lost. Farmers want some kind of centralized agency to regulate cotton production on this Nation's hundreds of thousands of farms. They want to keep total production of bales of cotton somewhere within a reasonable range of demand. The present law won't do it. It will set farm diversification in Texas back at least one generation. Enforcement will wreck much of the good done by the Extension Service and Soil Conservation Service. Farmers will plow up any and every class of land in order to increase the number of their tillable acres. The present law is evil, a twisted nightmare of all those asinine dreams that float eternally through the twilight mentalities of the glib visionaries who infest the National Capital.

HAMILTON COUNTY FARMERS PROTEST COTTON ALLOTMENTS

HAMILTON, TEX., January 8.—The Government's cotton acreage allotment program drew fire from Hamilton County farmers at a meeting attended by more than a hundred cotton growers.

A petition, protesting the allotments, which on 90 percent of the farms is less than 10 acres and on many of them just 5 acres, was sent to Congressman OMAR BURLESON, asking his aid in obtaining relief.

It was pointed out that many farmers who have not planted cotton in several years and who do not plan to plant any this year, have been granted allotments. BURLESON has pledged his aid in an effort to secure the reallotment of this unused acreage to farmers who wish to grow cotton.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

PROMOTING EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES FOR MINORITY GROUPS

Mr. HAYS of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, as a service to the House I would like to extend in my remarks a copy of a proposed substitute for the FEPC. This is in an effort to be helpful, because many Members have asked me just what the Arkansas plan is. Since I have not taken much time of the House in the last year to describe it I do want the Members to be informed on it. I have approached this problem with a compromising spirit, because I think the issue is divisive, and I think we should try to find a middle-of-the-road course. I realize that some principles should not be compromised, and I must say in all candor that I see no basis for compromise on the question of force and compulsion in private employment. I hope I have entertained at the same time a feeling of tolerance for the minority position. I realize that discrimination is an evil and in an effort to be helpful I have drawn what I think is a thoroughly American plan that I hope the Members will consider. I will extend it in my remarks.

The bill referred to is as follows:

H. R. 6668

A bill to aid in promoting employment opportunities for members of minority groups.

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Minorities Employment Act."

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 2. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States—

(1) to eliminate discrimination because of race, religion, color, national origin, or ancestry in regard to (A) opportunity for employment, (B) tenure, terms, or conditions of employment, or (C) membership in labor organizations; and

(2) to encourage to the fullest possible extent a policy of nondiscrimination throughout industry.

FUNCTIONS OF THE SECRETARY OF LABOR

SEC. 3. (a) The Secretary of Labor (referred to in this act as the "Secretary") shall—

(1) receive and investigate complaints charging any discrimination of the nature described in clause (1) of section 2 (referred to in this act as "discrimination"), and investigate other cases where he has reason to believe discrimination is practiced;

(2) endeavor, by methods of mediation and conciliation, to eliminate any discrimination disclosed by any such investigation;

(3) investigate and study the character, causes, and extent of discrimination in general;

(4) formulate plans for eliminating discrimination, after studying the best methods to accomplish that end;

(5) publish and disseminate (without regard to section 306 of the Penalty Mail Act of 1948) reports of the results of such studies and investigations in such form as may be most useful in accomplishing the policy declared in section 2; and

(6) cooperate with employers and labor organizations, and other private and public agencies, in formulating programs, educational and otherwise, to eliminate discrimination.

(b) In the performance of his functions under this act the Secretary may utilize the services of voluntary and uncompensated personnel.

(c) The United States Employment Service shall cooperate fully with the Secretary in effectuating the policy declared in section 2.

MINORITIES EMPLOYMENT BUREAU

SEC. 4. There is hereby created in the Department of Labor a Minorities Employment Bureau, to be headed by a Director who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be paid a salary of $ a year. The Director shall perform, under the direction and supervision of the Secretary, such of the Secretary's functions under this act as the Secretary may delegate to him.

LOCAL ADVISORY COUNCILS

SEC. 5. The Secretary may create such local, regional, and State advisory councils as in his judgment will aid in carrying out the policy declared in section 2. Any council so created shall, at the request of the Secretary, (1) study the general problem, and investigate specific instances, of discrimination in the area for which it is created; (2) foster, through community effort or otherwise, good will, cooperation, and conciliation among the various groups and elements of the population of such area; and (3) make recommendations to the Secretary with respect to his functions under this act. Each member of a local advisory council shall be appointed by the Secretary from among resident citizens of the area for which the council is created, and shall serve without pay, but shall be reimbursed under Government travel regulations for expenses incurred while performing duties under this section away from his place of residence. The Secretary may, without regard to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, employ and fix the compensation of such technical and clerical employees as may be necessary to assist advisory councils under this section.

NATIONAL ADVISORY COUNCIL

SEC. 6. The Secretary may create a National Advisory Council on Minority Problems to consult with him and make recommendations to him in regard to his functions under this act. The Council shall be composed of not more than seven members to be appointed by the Secretary, representing employers, employees, and the public. The number of members representing employers shall equal the number representing employees. Each member of the Council shall be paid compensation at the rate of $25 per day while engaged in the performance of duties under this section and shall be reimbursed under Government travel regulations for expenses incurred while so engaged away from his place of residence. The Council shall have access to all files and records of the Minorities Employment Bureau.

ANNUAL REPORT

SEC. 7. As soon as practicable after the close of each fiscal year the Secretary shall submit to Congress and to the President a report covering his activities under this act for such year, together with such further information and recommendations for further legislation with respect to the policy declared in section 2 as he deems advisable.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. YATES asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. KEOGH (at the request of Mr. MULTER) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

THE LATE MARTIN GORSKI

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, many fine tributes have been paid by his colleagues to the memory of our late friend Martin Gorski, but I am sure we all agree that words alone cannot express fully our feeling of his loss.

Our late dear friend from Illinois, in his service through four Congresses, made his influence for good felt in an unpretentious but effective fashion. His sincerity, his love for humanity, his industry on behalf of his constituents, his patriotism, and his unselfish desire to be helpful to all with whom he came in contact, were a shining example to his fellows.

Martin Gorski personified the spirit that has made America great. Rising from humble but God-loving parents of Polish origin, he repaid with service to the Nation and its people for the opportunities this land had given him. Individually he was representative of a practical ideal that has helped to bring America to its present position of eminence in the world; and that is, that men of varied nationality backgrounds, of different religious faiths, and of all races, can learn to live together in amity, each contributing to the richness and the growth of our country.

Our democracy is stronger today because Martin Gorski lived in its yesterday.

PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to inquire of the majority leader what the program for next week will be.

Mr. McCORMACK. I will be very glad to answer the gentleman.

Monday is Consent Calendar day.

While Tuesday is Private Calendar day, I am informed that there are no bills on the Private Calendar. There is no legislation scheduled on Tuesday or Wednesday unless the Committee on Rules, meeting tomorrow, should report out some rule, and then there might be an assignment for those days. But I have no knowledge of any now.

On Thursday the Korean aid bill will come up. That is the only piece of legislation that is specifically assigned for next week.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Is there a rule out on that bill?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Can the gentleman inform us how much general debate there will be on that bill?

Mr. McCORMACK. There will be 1 hour of general debate. We made an interim appropriation in the final appropriation bill last year, as you remember, of something like $60,000,000. That will terminate on February 15, as I remember, so that action has to be taken very soon. Consequently, we have assigned it for next Thursday.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. And the gentleman will advise us if he makes any additions to next week's program?

Mr. McCORMACK. Absolutely. I will know tomorrow. I will follow it very closely, and I will advise the leadership on the other side as far in advance as I can. I will know tomorrow and I will advise my friend from Massachusetts and the Republican whip so that the Members can be advised if anything is going to come up on Tuesday or Wednesday. There is nothing for Monday, so we can just rule that out.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. May I say to the gentleman that the inquiry was not made with any expectation that he would do other than he always has done in the past. The gentleman has always been very generous in giving us such information.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. SCUDDER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. JENNINGS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address delivered by himself.

Mr. McDONOUGH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article.

Mr. DEANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. RANKIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include certain excerpts from current publications and also from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

SIXTH REPORT OF THE ECONOMIC COOPERATION ADMINISTRATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States of America:

I am transmitting herewith the sixth report of the Economic Cooperation Administration created by the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948, Public Law 472 of the Eightieth Congress, approved April 3, 1948.

The report covers activities under the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948 (title I of Public Law 472, as amended) as well as the programs of economic aid to China under section 12 of Public Law 47, Eighty-first Congress, and to the Republic of Korea under the provisions of the Foreign Aid Appropriation Act of 1949 (Public Law 793, 80th Cong.) and Public Laws 154 and 196, Eighty-first Congress. There is also included in the appendix a summary of the status of the United States Foreign Relief Program (Public Law 84, 80th Cong.) and the United States Foreign Aid Program (Public Law 389, 80th Cong.).

This report is for the quarter ended September 30, 1949.

HARRY S TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 12, 1950.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned until Monday, January 16, 1950, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1108. 1111. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the audit of the financial statements, records, and procedures of the banks and corporations supervised by the Farm Credit Administration for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1947 (H. Doc. No. 443); to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and ordered to be printed.

1112. A letter from the Administrator, Housing and Home Finance Agency, transmitting a draft of a bill entitled "A bill to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act and title IV of the National Housing Act, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

1113. A letter from the Administrator, Housing and Home Finance Agency, transmitting a draft of a bill entitled "A bill to amend the National Housing Act, as amended, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

1114. A letter from the Acting Chairman, Federal Trade Commission, transmitting the Thirty-fifth Annual Report of the Federal Trade Commission, for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1949; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1115. A letter from the Acting Chairman, Federal Trade Commission, transmitting the Report of the Federal Trade Commission on Rates of Return for 528 Identical Companies in 25 Selected Manufacturing Industries, 1940, 1947, and 1948, Based on a Report to the Commission by Its Bureau of Industrial Economics; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1116. A letter from the Chairman, War Claims Commission, transmitting a draft of a bill entitled "A bill to amend the War Claims Act of 1948, as amended"; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1117. A letter from the Director, Administrative Office of the United States Courts, transmitting a copy of the detailed statement of expenditures of appropriations for the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1949; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. VINSON: Committee on Armed Services. Report on the investigation of the B–36 bomber program pursuant to House Resolution 234, Eighty-first Congress; without amendment (Rept. No. 1470). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

SENATE

FRIDAY, JANUARY 13, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 4, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Rev. Francis E. Corkery, S. J., president, Gonzaga University, Spokane, Wash., offered the following prayer:

In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

Eternal God, source of all wisdom, courage, and truth, we humbly implore Thy blessing upon this great legislative body of our Nation, whose deliberations will so deeply affect the lives of our people, and the peace and freedom of our world.

We are profoundly grateful for the privilege and blessing of citizenship in this great land—a land utterly unique in its beauty, its wealth, its fertility, its boundless opportunity—a land above all where men are still accorded the right of men to live in the freedom of the children of God.

Help us by Thy grace to preserve intact the noble philosophy upon which our Nation was founded and under which it has grown to greatness so that we may be Thy instrument in preserving for our Nation, and for the world, the dignity of man, human freedom, and basic human rights.

We ask these blessings in the name of Christ Jesus, our Lord. Amen.

ATTENDANCE OF A SENATOR

GARRETT L. WITHERS, a Senator from the State of Kentucky, appeared in his seat today.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. LUCAS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, January 12, 1950, was dispensed with.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. LUCAS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. MYERS. I announce that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] are absent on public business.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] is absent on official business.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] are absent on official business as members of a subcommittee of the Committee on Public Works, holding hearings on various flood-control and public-works projects in the State of New Mexico.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MARTIN] is absent on official business.

The Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] are necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. CAIN was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate Monday and Tuesday of next week.

COMMITTEE MEETING DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. FULBRIGHT, and by unanimous consent, the Committee on Foreign Relations was authorized to meet this afternoon during the session of the Senate.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senate for a moment in order that I may submit to the Senate a unanimous-consent agreement with respect to the business pending before the Senate.

I ask unanimous consent that the following order be entered:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That on the calendar day of Tuesday, January 17, 1950, at the hour of 1 o'clock p. m., the Senate proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending or that may be proposed to the so-called Wiley-Gillette substitute, as modified, for the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes; upon any amendment to an amendment to such substitute; and upon the substitute itself: Provided, That no amendment that is not germane to the subject matter of said substitute shall be in order.

Ordered further, That the time between 12 o'clock and 1 o'clock on said day be equally divided between the proponents and the opponents of the said substitute and controlled, respectively, by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I do not desire to object to the request if I can be given the understanding that certain amendments which have been proposed, which, of course, are not yet pending, but which it has been announced would be offered, are not germane to the pending bill. I speak with reference to what we all know as the civil-rights amendments. If they are not germane to the bill, then, of course, I have no objection to the request.

Mr. LUCAS. I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that what we are now proposing is to vote on what is identified as the Wiley-Gillette substitute. I am certain that the Presiding Officer and the Parliamentarian would say that the civil-rights amendments are certainly not germane to the Wiley-Gillette substitute.

Mr. McCLELLAN. It would be my interpretation also that they are not germane. I certainly could not consent to the request if I thought they were to be held germane and that a vote would be forced on them without opportunity to discuss them.

Mr. LUCAS. I appreciate what the Senator says. Let me add a further statement to the colloquy. Entering into the agreement would not preclude, however, the proponents of the civil-rights measures from offering them ultimately to the bill itself, in the event the substitute should be defeated.

Mr. McCLELLAN. But if the civil-rights amendments are then offered, debate would not be precluded on them?

Mr. LUCAS. Oh, no.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am sure the able majority leader appreciates what I am undertaking to do; that is, to make certain that we shall not be precluded from proper and full discussion of civil-rights amendments if and when they are offered.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator will not be precluded from debating at length all the civil-rights amendments, of course, when the time comes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wish to say that unfortunately the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and the junior Senator from Virginia were anxious to attend the inauguration of the new Governor of the State of Virginia, in whose success we had some interest, and we were scheduled, with the consent of the Senate, to be away from Washington on Tuesday of next week. I was under the impression a request would be made to vote on the Wiley-Gillette substitute on Monday.

I understand that in order to accommodate one or two Senators it is proposed that the vote be postponed until Tuesday. I realize, of course, that we cannot have any fixed date for voting in the future which will suit all 96 Members of this distinguished body. But it is my understanding that under parliamentary rules the bill must first be perfected, before action is taken on a substitute for the whole bill. If it would not unduly delay action on this important measure it would certainly be most accommodating to the senior Senator from Virginia and the junior Senator from Virginia if the time from now until Thursday could be consumed in perfecting the bill and disposing of that, and then on Thursday next the vote be taken on the substitute. I ask our distinguished majority leader if he would not be willing that that be done.

Mr. LUCAS. I appreciate the position in which the able Senator from Virginia finds himself with respect to a long-standing engagement which I, of course, know is tremendously important to both Senators from Virginia.

Mr. President, we find ourselves in the same situation we always do with respect to requests for a unanimous-consent agreement. Personally, I should like to vote this afternoon. Yesterday I offered a request for a unanimous-consent agreement providing for a vote this afternoon. We have debated and discussed the pending amendment at great length. In my opinion there is no reason why we could not vote on it this afternoon, and then permit the bill to go over until Monday, and vote on the bill some time Monday. In my opinion, the pending amendment is the most important amendment which will be presented by any Senator with respect to the merits of the bill. We have debated it some 11 or 12 days. It seems to me we should be able to vote on it this afternoon. I am perfectly willing to do that, rather than vote on the amendment on Monday or Tuesday, or wait until the following Thursday to vote on the bill. If we are going to wait another week we might just as well have no unanimous-consent agreement at all, and simply let the debate take its natural course, finally making a determination one way or the other.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. By way of inquiry, I should like to ask the able majority leader if he has explored the possibility, and if there is a likelihood of achievement, of having the unanimous-consent request which he has just propounded amended so as to provide for a vote on Monday instead of Tuesday, and whether we could not accommodate ourselves to that situation without injury to any particular Senator?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in reply to the distinguished Senator from Maryland, I should like to say to him that it was more or less on the advice of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] that we agreed to vote on Tuesday. I am sure the Senator from Arkansas did not appreciate the situation in which the two Senators find themselves at this time, although I am sure he was attempting to accommodate two other Senators who cannot be here on Monday.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, let me say that is exactly the case. I was in hope that we could reach a vote today and that we could obtain agreement in that respect from the proponents of the substitute.

Then the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], in discussing this matter, said the one day they could not be here was Monday. I agreed I would not ask for the vote on Monday. I am perfectly willing to have the vote taken either today or on Tuesday.

But I hope Senators will realize that there will not be any day when some Senator will not be absent. In view of the preliminary discussion we had with the Senator from Nebraska yesterday, I understood that Tuesday was acceptable.

If we attempt to wait until every Senator can be present, it will only mean that we may not be able to get a vote at all, or else not for a very long time.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President——

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield first to the Senator from Virginia, who has been on his feet, requesting recognition, for some time.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I wish to say that it has never been my inclination at any time since I have been a Member of this body or of the body across the hall, to ask for special consideration for myself.

I presented my peculiar problem. I realize what the majority leader is up against.

I am committed to vote for the repeal of the tax on yellow oleomargarine, and I wish to go on record on that vote. The bill is an important one, and it already has consumed much time in a very vital session which I believe and hope will end by July 31.

I shall not object to the request for a vote at 1 o'clock on Tuesday, and I shall cancel my engagement in Richmond up to that point, and then light out, and hope I will not get arrested going down there. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair might advise the Senate, for its information, that so far as the Chair knows, only three Senators have indicated a purpose to speak today—if that will shed any light upon the possibility of an early vote.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I wish to state to the distinguished majority leader, now that he has yielded, that it is perfectly agreeable to try to have the agreement provide for the vote on Monday. I think that can be done. I am sure I told the distinguished Senator from Arkansas that a vote on Monday would be agreeable. But in order to work out the unanimous-consent agreement in compliance with the request of the Senator from Arkansas, we made it Tuesday.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. Now the Senator from Virginia has agreed to a vote on Tuesday, so that hurdle has been crossed.

I am quite satisfied now that it will be agreeable to vote on Tuesday, so far as concerns Senators on this side of the aisle to whom I have spoken. I did not canvass every Senator, but I did take up the matter with those who are in charge of the pending legislation. We talked to as many as we could.

But in order that each and every Senator might be here to present his views and ideas as to whether the vote should be taken on Monday or on Tuesday, the matter is now being discussed, after a quorum call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would state that, under the rule, a quorum call is not required before entering into a unanimous-consent agreement, in regard to a vote on an amendment; but only in regard to a final vote on a bill or joint resolution is a quorum call required.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, it is my understanding, however—and I agree with what the distinguished President of the Senate has just said—that the proposed unanimous-consent agreement also includes an agreement to vote on the substitute; and the substitute, if adopted, will preclude any further amendments to the bill. For that reason, I suggested to the distinguished majority leader that I personally would like to have a quorum call, because in reality, if the substitute is adopted, that vote will preclude the offering of amendments to the bill.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in reply to the distinguished minority leader, let me say that we had a quorum call yesterday on that theory. After we went through with the quorum call, I understood that two Senators were to be absent today, so that the Senator from Nebraska had to make objection for them, so far as having a vote taken this afternoon. So, after all, there was no use in having a quorum call under those circumstances; it was rather absurd to do so, because the distinguished minority leader had to protect the two Senators who would not be here today, and who would have objected if they had been here on yesterday.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I think that if the RECORD is examined closely it will be found that I stated I wanted to object until later in the afternoon, because I had been told by two Senators that they desired to offer an amendment to the bill. I was not sure that they would offer it; and I said that I would endeavor to work out a unanimous-consent agreement at that time.

I appreciate the fact that the majority leader has endeavored to comply with my request in regard to quorum calls. There is no dispute here, unless there will be objection on the part of some Senator whom we have not yet contacted to agreeing to vote on Tuesday.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in view of the last statement made by the minority leader, I wonder whether we can agree to vote at 4 or 5 o'clock this afternoon on this amendment.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me say I have no intention of objecting to the unanimous-consent proposal which has been made to vote on Tuesday. I shall object if there is an attempt to change the proposal to provide for a vote on an earlier date.

Under the reservation of objection I have just made, I should like to ask one question of the majority leader, relative to the purpose and effect of the unanimous-consent request. As I understand, the effect will be to give the substitute and amendments pending to the substitute precedence over the amendments offered to the original bill, which are pending, and will dispose of the substitute and amendments to it, as of the date fixed, but will leave the bill and other amendments to be considered later.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is absolutely correct in his understanding of the unanimous-consent proposal.

Mr. GILLETTE. I should not object to the original proposal; but in view of the statement made by the junior Senator from Virginia, I shall object to any attempt to reach an agreement for a vote prior to that time.

Mr. LUCAS. I thoroughly understand the position of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President——

Mr. LUCAS. I now yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, the senior Senator from New Jersey and the junior Senator from New Jersey find themselves in exactly the same position as that of the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON]. On Tuesday New Jersey is inaugurating a governor who has won the admiration of the people of the State, and who is very close to the New Jersey Senators. We would like, if we can, to be in attendance at that inauguration. So we would prefer, if possible, to reach a unanimous-consent agreement for a vote before Tuesday.

However, if the unanimous-consent agreement is to provide for a vote on Tuesday, we, like the distinguished junior Senator from Virginia, will stand by and will participate in the agreement which is reached by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement which has been proposed?

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, let me inquire who has the floor. I yielded to the Senator from New Jersey.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey concluded his remarks, and the Senator from Oregon rose under what the Chair thought was a reservation of objection.

Mr. CORDON. The Chair is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. Do I still have the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois does.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the Senator from Oregon wait for a moment, please?

Mr. CORDON. I am happy to do so.

Mr. LUCAS. Did the Senator from New Jersey make objection to the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I did not make objection. I said that I thought it would be very inconvenient for the senior Senator from New Jersey and the junior Senator from New Jersey to be here on Tuesday; yet if the Senate enters into the unanimous-consent agreement to vote on Tuesday, we will be here to vote on Tuesday.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator.

I now yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to inquire whether the request for unanimous consent, if granted, would preclude the offering of any additional amendments to the pending substitute.

Mr. LUCAS. The unanimous-consent agreement as proposed permits any amendments to be offered to the pending substitute up to the time when the voting begins, which would be at 1 o'clock on Tuesday.

Mr. CORDON. In other words, we would vote at 1 o'clock on Tuesday on the substitute, and at that time the amendments which may be offered to the substitute prior to that time will be voted on before the substitute itself is voted on. Is that correct?

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct, assuming that the amendments are germane.

Mr. CORDON. I have no objection.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. IVES. Reserving the right to object, let me say that I myself had planned to be away on Tuesday. But if all other Senators are going to yield in respect to Tuesday, I shall withdraw any objection which otherwise I would make, and will cancel my engagement.

However, in view of the fact that it seems that there are now five of us who would like very much to be away on Tuesday, if we can do so, I would prefer to have the vote taken on Thursday, because I understand that some Senators who have to be away on Tuesday also have to be away on Wednesday.

So I wonder whether the majority leader would amend his proposal so as to provide for the taking of the vote on Thursday.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in reply, I reluctantly say that I cannot agree to make that change. If we can reach agreement to vote on Tuesday, I feel that we must do so.

I thoroughly understand the position of the Senator from New York and of other Senators; but, after all, there is important business which must be disposed of by the Senate, and we are now on the second week of the debate on this measure, and have not yet voted on a single amendment. Yesterday the distinguished Senator from Arkansas was willing to accept an amendment offered by the distinguished junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY], but that is the only business which has been transacted in connection with the pending measure. I feel that we must get along with the business of the Senate, and I simply cannot agree to a further postponement.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me say that the senior Senator from New York will not object to having the vote taken on Tuesday; and, as other Senators have indicated, he will cancel his engagement for Tuesday, under those circumstances.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I do not wish to be technical, but I should like to respond to the inquiry made by the distinguished Senator from Oregon. If I correctly understand the unanimous-consent agreement, it provides that the Senate shall proceed, without further debate, to vote upon any amendment which may be pending at that time or any amendment which may be proposed, so that all rights are protected. Of course, there could be no debate on an amendment after the hour fixed in the proposed agreement, but an amendment could be offered until the vote is taken on the substitute. Am I correct?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will answer the question. Under the unanimous-consent proposal, any and all germane amendments can be offered up to the hour of 1 o'clock; but, after 1 o'clock, they cannot be debated. They can be voted upon before the final vote on the substitute. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I feel that we should try to accommodate Senators who may be inconvenienced by the agreement. The agreement was attempted to be entered into, without consultation with certain Senators who are really concerned. At various times, the majority leader has spoken about the debate having extended a long time. Fortunately, I have had the RECORD examined, and I find that, during a period of about 2 weeks, and until yesterday, the total time consumed was 29 hours and 15 minutes. From January 4 to January 11, inclusive, there were 14 hours and 15 minutes consumed in discussion of the oleo bill. The remainder of the time was consumed on other matters. If we estimate that a period of 5 hours was consumed on the bill yesterday, the total time spent on the oleo bill is 19 hours and 15 minutes. The proponents of the bill consumed in the neighborhood of 4 hours of that time. So I do not think there can be any suggestion of undue delay. We had a discussion of world affairs and of other issues which were injected. Debate on extraneous matters yesterday consumed more than 1 hour.

I, for one, should like to have an agreement which would accommodate as many Senators as possible, such as an agreement fixing the time for voting on Thursday next. I feel that it is very important that Senators be here, if possible. I must say that the opposition is pretty well informed as to who, on their side, will be absent at certain times, but we do not have the machinery and the facilities for doing that. I feel that I should suggest to the majority leader that the request which has been made by the five Senators be given consideration, and that we see whether it is possible to arrange for a vote sometime Thursday afternoon.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a tabulation showing the time spent in debating the oleo bill from Wednesday, January 4, to Wednesday, January 11, inclusive, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tabulation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEBATE ON H. R. 2023, THE OLEOMARGARINE BILL

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 4, 1950

Duration of session: 3 hours and 52 minutes.

Discussion: 2 hours.

The bill was taken up about 1:55 p. m. and discussed by Senators GEORGE and FULBRIGHT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 5

Duration of session: 5 hours and 55 minutes.

Discussion: 1 hour and 20 minutes.

Senator GILLETTE spoke approximately 1 hour and 20 minutes.

Foreign policy debate consumed rest of session.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 6

Duration of session: 2 hours and 53 minutes.

Discussion: 2 hours and 10 minutes.

Senator AIKEN, approximately 1 hour and 15 minutes.

Senators MCCARTHY, LANGER, and WILEY about 55 minutes.

MONDAY, JANUARY 9

Duration of session: 5 hours and 58 minutes.

Discussion: None.

No discussion of oleo bill. Foreign policy debated entire day.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 10

Duration of session: 5 hours and 38 minutes.

Discussion: 5 hours.

Senator HUMPHREY spoke about 2 hours. Senators YOUNG, BUTLER, and ECTON took about 2½ hours. Quorum calls and discussion of time to vote took about 30 minutes.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11

Duration of session: 5 hours and 2 minutes.

Discussion: 3 hours and 45 minutes.

Senators THYE and LANGER consumed approximately 3 hours and 45 minutes.

Approximate time consumed in debate on oleo bill from January 4 to January 11, inclusive: 14 hours and 15 minutes.

Total time Senate in session: 29 hours and 18 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, does that mean that we are to vote at 1 o'clock Tuesday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The vote is to be taken at 1 o'clock Tuesday.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. HICKENLOOPER obtained the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, and if the Senator from Iowa will yield for that purpose, the Chair will recognize Senators who wish to put in the RECORD petitions or memorials, and introduce bills or present other routine matters. It is better to do it now than to have it done throughout the afternoon.

REPORT OF PHILIPPINE ALIEN PROPERTY ADMINISTRATION — MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the second annual report for the Philippine Alien Property Administration for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1948.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 13, 1950.

EXHIBITION OF WORKS OF ART FROM VIENNA MUSEUMS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a letter from the National Gallery of Art, Washington, D. C., which may be of interest to Senators. The clerk will read the letter.

The legislative clerk read the letter, as follows:

NATIONAL GALLERY OF ART,
Washington, D. C., January 12, 1950.

The Honorable ALBEN W. BARKLEY,
The Vice President of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: The exhibition of works of art from the Vienna museums, which are on loan from the Austrian Government to the National Gallery, will close on Sunday, January 22. The attendance has been very large and will probably increase during the closing days of the exhibition.

I would like for the Members of the Senate and their families to have an opportunity of seeing the collection as comfortably as possible and would be delighted to arrange a private view for them on Friday afternoon, January 20, after the gallery closes at 5 o'clock. We should be glad to have them come to the gallery from 5:15 to 7 o'clock and to use the entrance on Constitution Avenue at Sixth Street. I should be grateful if you would be kind enough to extend the invitation to them and also to the Senators' secretaries, clerks of the committees, and members of the Senate Press Gallery, with their wives.

I hope that we shall have the pleasure of welcoming you and Mrs. Barkley on that occasion, and with kind regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

DAVID E. FINLEY, Director.

A letter from the Acting Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting, for the information of the Senate, a copy of its report entitled "Report on the Fertilizer Industry" (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

The petition of Hugh P. Andrews, of Portland, Oreg., praying for the enactment of legislation which would give special recognition to veterans who served in both world wars (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Armed Services.

Resolutions adopted by the Miami Townsend Club, No. 1, and the West Palm Beach Townsend Club, No. 1, both in the State of Florida, favoring the enactment of the so-called Townsend plan, providing old-age insurance; to the Committee on Finance.

A resolution adopted by the Gate City Lodge of B'nai B'rith, Atlanta, Ga., favoring the prompt ratification of the genocide convention of the United Nations; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Resolutions adopted by the Northwestern Ohio Dental Society, of Lima, and the Akron Dental Society, both of the State of Ohio, protesting against the enactment of legislation providing compulsory health insurance; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The memorial of Mrs. George H. Coon and sundry other members of the Harbor Delphians of Bay Ridge, of Brooklyn, N. Y., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing compulsory health insurance, etc.; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma; to the Committee on Public Works:

"House Concurrent Resolution 6

"Concurrent resolution respectfully asking the Congress of the United States by and through the Oklahoma delegation to appropriately rename the Red River Dam

"Whereas the Great White Father in His infinite wisdom has seen fit to vest this land with the great river on our south boundary called by the Spanish, Indians, and Americans, the Red River; and

"Whereas by treaty between the Spanish and United States Governments in the year 1819, and later upheld by the United States Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Texas (162 U. S. 1), it has been declared that the boundary between the States of Oklahoma and Texas is the south bank of the Red River which decision has later been declared to be the high-water mark of the south bank of the Red River; and

"Whereas the Federal Government has constructed the Red River Dam at an approximate cost of $55,000,000, for the purpose of creating a vast amount of power from the said river; and

"Whereas the Red River Dam, although a far greater portion is in Oklahoma, has been erroneously named the "Denison Dam": Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Extraordinary Session of the Twenty-second Oklahoma Legislature (the Senate concurring therein):

"1. That the Congress of the United States be, and is, hereby earnestly requested to rename the Red River Dam.

"2. Be it further resolved, That the land comprising the said dam and lake having been originally the 'Indian Territory' that the name 'Okachito Dam,' 'Okachito' being the Choctaw word for 'Big Water,' be adopted to replace the name it now bears. This would appropriately rename the Red River Dam as well as pay tribute to the pioneer citizens of this great State and Nation.

"3. And providing that a copy of this resolution be sent to each member of the Oklahoma delegation in Congress, both the House of Representatives and the United States Senate.

"Adopted by the house of representatives the 14th day of December 1949."

By Mr. MORSE:

Petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Oregon, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the transportation of alcoholic beverage advertising in interstate commerce; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PROHIBITION OF LIQUOR ADVERTISING—PETITION

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, on January 11, I presented to the Senate petitions sent to me by Mrs. Cora S. Palmer, legislative director, WCTU, Sussex County, Del., signed by 1,073 citizens of Sussex County in support of legislation to prohibit the transportation of alcoholic beverage advertising in interstate commerce, now pending before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I have today received a similar petition from Mrs. Palmer signed by 45 citizens of Sussex County. I ask that this petition also be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition presented by the Senator from Delaware will be received and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

TRANSFER OF VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION HOSPITAL PROGRAM—RESOLUTION OF NORTH DAKOTA DEPARTMENT, THE AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a resolution adopted by the Department of North Dakota, the American Legion, at its midwinter conference at Fargo, N. Dak., December 12 and 13, 1949, relating to the recommendation of the Hoover Commission which advocates the transfer of the Veterans' Administration hospital program to social-welfare agencies.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas certain uninformed individuals and organizations have recently seen fit to again flood this country, as they did following World War I, with erroneous propaganda concerning the cost of the veterans' rehabilitation program established by the Congress of the United States; and

Whereas such activity is designed to bluff the American people into believing that this Nation's veterans, particularly the wounded and disabled who are still fighting their war from hospital and sick beds, are receiving benefits to which they are not justly entitled; and

Whereas the cost of rehabilitating this Nation's veterans, who served their country in time of need, must be considered as part of the actual expense of war as was the cost of bombs, planes, and ships during armed hostilities; and

Whereas the Hoover Commission Report, which suggests the elimination of the Veterans' Administration as the agency responsible for the administration of veterans' laws, was written without seeking the advice and counsel of those who have made the care of disabled veterans their life's work; and

Whereas the adoption of the Hoover Commission Report would place the care of disabled veterans under several Government agencies wholly incapable of and absolutely unwilling to appreciate the many problems of the veterans of all our wars and their dependents; and

Whereas the Hoover-suggested procedure was tested after World War I and was found wanting because of the red tape and confusion it caused and the unnecessary expense it placed upon the taxpayers of our country due to the many Government agencies which attempted the handling of veterans' affairs; and

Whereas Congress eliminated such confusion by establishing the Veterans' Bureau, now known as the Veterans' Administration: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the annual midwinter conference of the American Legion, Department of North Dakota, meeting at Fargo, N. Dak., December 12 and 13, 1949, That the American Legion vigorously oppose that portion of the Hoover Commission Report pertaining to veterans which advocates the elimination of the Veterans' Administration hospital program and the turning over of that program to social-welfare agencies, and that the American Legion take immediate steps necessary to present the true picture of veterans' activities in correction of the insidious misinformation now being circulated by antiveteran individuals and organizations.

REPEAL OF EXCISE TAXES ON CERTAIN COSMETICS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have previously pointed out some of the problems raised by the heavy wartime excise taxes on various industries in America. One such burden has received comparatively less attention than it so eminently deserves, and I am referring to the excises on the cosmetics and other preparations used in connection with services rendered in barber and beauty shops. I feel that these excise taxes should long ago have been repealed and I am hoping that under the Butler-Johnson amendment to the pending bill, H. R. 2023, now before the Senate, we can wipe out these and many other nuisances.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of two important letters which I have received from the national organization and from the Associated Master Barbers in Milwaukee, Wis., be printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The letters arrived prior to the offering on the floor of the excise-tax-repeal amendment to the pending bill.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ASSOCIATED MASTER BARBERS OF MILWAUKEE,
Milwaukee, Wis., January 7, 1950.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WILEY: Once again we urgently and respectfully request that you support legislation which will remove unjust excise taxes from the cosmetics used in connection with the services performed by barbers and beauticians.

In the giving of shampoos, facials, scalp treatments, permanent waves, and many other services the use of cosmetic preparations in conjunction therewith is essential as the using of shears, combs, brushes, tweezers, and other instruments, and therefore these cosmetics must be deemed to be tools of our trades as much as the very furniture with which our shops are equipped or the instruments referred to.

We plead that we are entitled to be relieved from unjust taxation which adds to our burdens in operating our businesses on a profitable basis with the coincident opportunity of our employees to earn a living. Please help us.

Respectfully yours,
NORBERT C. KOFFARNUS,
Secretary.

ASSOCIATED MASTER BARBERS AND BEAUTICIANS OF AMERICA,
Chicago, Ill., December 29, 1949.

DEAR SENATOR: We again take this means of registering a protest against what we deem to be an unfair excise tax on the cosmetic preparations used in conjunction with services rendered in barber and beauty shops. Since 1942 barber and beauty shop owners have suffered the imposition of these taxes which have added to their burdens in trying to operate their places of business profitably while at the same time trying to pay good wages to their employees. This legislation, enacted as a means for securing revenue to help prosecute the war, should have been repealed coincident with cessation of hostilities in the interest of encouraging a large group of small-business people.

We point out to you that cosmetics used in giving services in barber and beauty shops are in fact tools of the trade, inasmuch as a barber or beautician cannot apply a shampoo or facial, as well as many other services, without using cosmetics incident thereto. The requirement of using cosmetics in barber and beauty shops is as necessary as is the requirement of using shears, razors, clippers, tweezers, permanent waving machines, curlers, and so forth, all of which are recognized as tools of the trade. Tools of the trade should not be burdened with excise taxes, and we believe that conviction is unanimous.

We refer you to House Report No. 1970, which contains considerable information and facts relative to this matter. We also call to your attention the bill known as H. R. 3825, which passed the House in the Eightieth Congress, a bill which sought repeal of these unfair excise taxes on cosmetics used in barber and beauty shops.

The thousands of barber and beauty-shop owners in your own State and throughout the Nation ask you through this association to support and vote for any legislation which seeks to remove the unfair excise taxes now levied on cosmetics used in connection with barber or beauty shop services. We need the relief which you can give us.

Sincerely yours,
T. C. MACDUFFEE,
General President.
LOUIS E. MCILVAIN,
General Secretary-Treasurer.

THE COAL SHORTAGE IN INDIANA

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD 12 telegrams which I have received today from 12 greenhouses in and near the city of Indianapolis. In all the telegrams complaint is made that they will be forced to close within anywhere from 3 days to a week because of the shortage of coal.

Not being in the coal business, I have no way of knowing whether a national emergency exists in respect to coal. But if one can take at face value the statements made in the telegrams which I am receiving from people in Indiana, certainly a grave emergency exists in the city of Indianapolis and nearby. Therefore, I have requested unanimous consent to have the telegrams printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., January 13, 1950.
HOMER E. CAPEHART:
In bad need of coal to operate greenhouses for vegetables.
LAWRENCE WIEGMAN.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., January 13, 1950.
Senator HOMER E. CAPEHART,
Senate Office Building:
Desperate need of coal for greenhouses growing lettuce and tomatoes.
FRED H. ROSEBROCK.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., January 13, 1950.
HOMER E. CAPEHART:
Survey indicates that one-half million dollars damage will be done to Marion County greenhouse crop if we don't get coal to supply them within 1 week. It is urgent that you use all influence possible to get us coal.
SCHUSTER COAL CO.,
J. F. HARRIS.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., January 13, 1950.
HOMER E. CAPEHART:
Coal supply very critical. The greenhouse vegetable industry will have to close down unless immediate action is taken.
BREHOB BROS.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., January 13, 1950.
Hon. HOMER E. CAPEHART,
Senate Office Building:
Please give immediate attention to coal shortage. One week's supply left.
MARION COUNTY GREENHOUSE GROWERS,
FRED HOELTKE,
FREDERICK HOELTKE,
FORREST MEYERS.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., January 13, 1950.
Senator HOMER CAPEHART:
Coal situation critical in Marion County.
ERVIN BUESCHER,

FRED OLLE,
Greenhouse Vegetable Grower.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., January 13, 1950.
Senator HOMER CAPEHART:
As president of 65 greenhouse vegetable growers, need aid on this critical coal shortage. Due to mild weather we have been able to stretch coal to the limit; now it is critical. If cold front moved in, we would be out of coal within week. Sad state of affairs when two men can manipulate Congress as well as public like puppets on a string. Wake up Congressmen, do something about this coal shortage. One hour of zero weather without heat can wipe out 6 months' work.

Curtis G. Southard and sundry other candidates for promotion in the Regular Corps of the Public Health Service.

TREATY WITH ORIENTAL REPUBLIC OF URUGUAY—REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY

The VICE PRESIDENT. As in executive session, the Chair lays before the Senate Executive D, Eighty-first Congress, second session, a treaty of friendship, commerce, and economic development between the United States of America and the Oriental Republic of Uruguay, signed at Montevideo on November 23, 1949. Without objection, the injunction of secrecy will be removed from the treaty, and the treaty, together with the President's message, will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the President's message will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The President's message is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith a treaty of friendship, commerce, and economic development between the United States of America and the Oriental Republic of Uruguay, together with a protocol, an additional protocol, and an exchange of notes, relating thereto, signed at Montevideo on November 23, 1949. The enclosed treaty is a comprehensive instrument which takes into account the developments in international relationships during the past century and is intended to meet effectively the needs of the present day.

I transmit also, for the information of the Senate, a report on the treaty made to me by the Secretary of State.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 13, 1950.

(Enclosures: (1) Report of the Secretary of State; (2) treaty of friendship, commerce, and economic development, with protocol, additional protocol, and exchange of notes, signed at Montevideo, November 23, 1949.)

The letter presented by Mr. TYDINGS is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, January 13, 1950.

Hon. MILLARD E. TYDINGS,
Chairman, Armed Services Committee, United States Senate.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: There are forwarded herewith on behalf of the Department of Defense drafts of 11 legislative proposals together with appropriate justifications for each legislative proposal. As Secretary of Defense I respectfully recommend that these proposals be enacted into law.

These proposals are forwarded with the approval of the Bureau of the Budget and represent, by number of items, approximately half of this Department's 1950 legislative program. As you know, our over-all legislative program, as submitted to the Bureau of the Budget, has already been made available on an informal basis to the staffs of the Senate and House Armed Services Committees.

The balance of our program, in addition to the items submitted herewith, excepting only four items which are undergoing certain drafting changes in this office, are now under active consideration by the Bureau of the Budget for comment as to the relationship of our proposals to the program of the President. It is anticipated that the Bureau of the Budget will be able to advise me within the next few weeks as to the relationship to the program of the President of these remaining items. As these advices are received such items as are approved will be forwarded to you by the Assistant Secretary of Defense.

This is the first attempt by the Department to formulate in one package for submission to Congress and the Bureau of the Budget a complete program of legislation for an ensuing session of the Congress. It is not yet as complete as I would like it to be, but in its present form it represents a substantial step forward from previous years' practices. As you know, under prior practice, the separate items of each military departmental program were forwarded at irregular intervals during the full two sessions. It is my hope that next year the Department can offer to the Congress on the day it convenes, and in a single package, the entire legislative needs of the Department, and to that end plans are already under way.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

LOUIS JOHNSON.

PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL COPIES OF IMMIGRATION HEARINGS BEFORE JUDICIARY SUBCOMMITTEE

Mr. McCARRAN submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 69), which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,000 additional copies of the hearings conducted before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary on S. 1832, Eighty-first Congress, first session, to amend the Immigration Act of October 16, 1918, as amended. Such additional copies shall be for the use of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES—AMENDMENTS

Mr. CORDON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the amendment in the nature of a substitute submitted by Mr. WILEY (for himself and other Senators) to the bill (H. EXEMPTION FROM TAX OF COSMETICS SOLD TO BARBER SHOPS AND BEAUTY PARLORS—STATEMENT BY SENATOR BUTLER

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the body of the RECORD a statement I have prepared with regard to my amendment proposing to exempt from the tax cosmetics sold by barber shops and beauty parlors for use in the operation thereof.

I also ask to have attached to the statement a copy of my amendment and a copy of House Report No. 1970 of the Eightieth Congress dealing with this matter.

There being no objection, Mr. BUTLER's statement, the amendment, and the report were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, at this time I would like to make a brief statement explaining one of the amendments I have prepared to the bill, H. R. 2023, relating to oleomargarine, so that when it comes time to vote Senators may be familiar with the amendment and the reasons for it. I refer to my amendment to exempt from tax any toilet preparations sold to barber-shop and beauty-shop operators when intended for use in the operation thereof and not for resale.

When we discuss excise taxes, we sometimes refer to them as nuisance taxes. That designation is not always correct. They may be a nuisance, but some of them do bring in substantial revenue. The amendment I am discussing now, however, relates to a tax which is practically all nuisance and no revenue. My amendment proposes to repeal the cosmetics tax only on those items which are actually used on the customers in barber shops and beauty parlors.

The revenue derived from the tax on toilet preparations as a whole is fairly substantial—$95,000,000—but the tax on that portion of the cosmetic business which is sold for use in barber shops and beauty parlors is very small—about $3,300,000. Evidently repealing this particular tax would not affect the Federal revenue materially.

The tax on hair tonic, fingernail polish, and items of that sort used by barbers and beauticians in their actual operations is probably not too heavy a burden on them, although as a matter of principle I personally do not think we should levy taxes that simply go into business costs. However, that is not the real reason for removing this tax.

The principal reason for my amendment is that under present procedure as long as there is a tax on such items when used in the operations of the beauty parlor or barber shops, the Treasury must collect it and enforce it through methods which frighten the beauty or barber shop out of handling toilet preparations and cosmetics for retail sale at all. Under the present procedure, each barber or beauty-shop operator handling cosmetics must sign a "certificate of purchase for resale," and that certificate, among other things, provides for a fine of up to $10,000 or imprisonment of up to 5 years for fraudulent use. It also places upon the barber or beautician the burden of establishing competent evidence that the articles were actually purchased for the purpose stated in the certificate.

The simple effect of this whole business is to scare the average barber and beautician out of handling cosmetics for retail at all. The average barber is not a lawyer or even a skilled bookkeeper. He does not want to be involved in anything that involves a potential danger of fines running up to $10,000 and prison terms that might run 5 years. It is all right to talk about "fraudulent use," but there is always a chance of an honest mistake that might be misinterpreted. It is much simpler just to avoid the whole business by not handling toilet preparations for resale at all.

My amendment would likewise repeal the requirement for this "certificate of purchase for resale." It would leave the tax on the basis of a simple retail sales tax, similar to the many other retail sales taxes that we have in the excise tax structure.

Two years ago this identical proposal was considered and favorably acted on by the House Ways and Means Committee and the House in the form of H. R. 3825 of the Eightieth Congress. At that time the bill was not acted on by the Senate because it was anticipated that there would be a review of the entire tax structure the following year, which was last year, 1949. However, no such review took place, and we have no real guaranty that it can be had during the current session. I, therefore, hope very much that the Senate will adopt this amendment.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. BUTLER to the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes, viz: At the appropriate place, add the following new section:

"SEC. . Effective on and after the first day of the first month which begins more than 10 days after the date of enactment of this act, section 2402 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code, as amended, is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: 'except when sold to any person operating a barber shop, beauty parlor, or similar establishment for use in the operation thereof.'

"Effective the same date, section 2402 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code, as amended, is repealed."

EXCISE TAX EXEMPTION OF TOILET PREPARATIONS SOLD FOR USE IN THE OPERATION OF BARBER AND BEAUTY SHOPS

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3825) to amend section 2402 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code, as amended, and to repeal section 2402 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code, as amended, having considered the same, report favorably thereon without amendment and recommend that the bill do pass.

EFFECT OF THE BILL

The bill would exempt from the retailers' excise tax toilet preparations sold to the operator of a barber shop, beauty parlor, or similar establishment for use in the operation thereof. By specific provision of existing law, such a sale is considered a sale at retail and is taxed accordingly. Resales by such an establishment would continue to be taxed as under existing law.

The bill would also repeal the provision of existing law which taxes toilet preparations sold to such an operator for resale but used in the operation of his establishment.

NEED FOR THE LEGISLATION

Existing law, as indicated above, treats a sale of toilet preparations to the operator of a barber shop, beauty parlor, or similar establishment, for use in its operation, as a sale at retail, for purposes of the excise tax. It also accords to the business use of such preparations the status of a retail sale, where the operator bought for resale but in fact used the preparations in the operation of his business. To have made the tax base the portion of the service charge attributable in the preparations used in rendering the service would have created extreme difficulties of administration by the Bureau of Internal Revenue and of compliance by the taxpayer. Accordingly, the tax base in such a case was made the price paid for the article by the proprietor. The result is a hybrid scheme of taxation, having features both of a manufacturers' excise tax and a retailers' excise tax. The tax base, therefore, is subject to all the variations dependent upon whether the operator buys his supplies of the manufacturer or of a wholesaler or other distributor. It is apparent that such a shifting tax base results in fluctuating operating costs and competitive inequalities, and, at the same time, achieves no adequate solution of the difficulties of administration or compliance.

In the enforcement of the present law governing the application of the tax to preparations used in the service of patrons of a barber shop, beauty parlor, or similar establishment, recourse is had to a requirement that the operator must certify that all purchases made by him for resale will be resold and not used in the operation of the establishment. The "certificate of purchase for resale" recites the understanding of the proprietor, among other things, that the fraudulent use of the certificate to secure "exemption" will subject him and all guilty parties to a fine of "not more than $10,000 or to imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both, together with the costs of prosecution."[1] Operators are reluctant to make purchases for resale under such penalties and the retail market for toilet preparations is curtailed as a result. And the deterrent exists, regardless of the fact that articles purchased for resale may, nevertheless, be used in the operation of the business if the tax thereon is paid when they are first set aside for such use.

Under the present statute, resales of toilet preparations bought for operational use appear subject to the severe penalties mentioned in the certificate of purchase for resale; under the statute as proposed to be changed by the bill, such resales would be taxable in the same manner as other sales at retail.

For these reasons, your committee believes that the enactment of the bill would serve the best interests of the industry and facilitate the tax collecting functions of the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

REVENUE EFFECT

Collections of the tax on toilet preparations during the fiscal year 1947 amounted to about $95,500,000. It is estimated that not more than $3,300,000 of that amount is attributable to sales of the kind proposed to be exempted by the bill. Moreover, in the opinion of your committee, the apparent loss in revenue from the exemption of such sales would be more than offset by the increased yield from sales in a broadened retail market.

An increased income tax yield would also follow reduced business costs and an enlarged volume of sales at retail. There are said to be some 240,000 barber shops and beauty parlors in the country.

ANALYSIS OF THE BILL

The exemption proposed by the bill would be accomplished by amending subsection (a) of section 2402 of the Internal Revenue Code and repealing subsection (b) of that section.

The amendment consists in the addition of a clause excepting from the application of the tax imposed by the subsection on toilet preparations sold at retail such articles "sold to any person operating a barber shop, beauty parlor, or similar establishment for use in the operation thereof." Sales to such establishments for resale would continue to be taxed, as under existing law, when resale is made. Under the bill, likewise, preparations so sold would be taxed upon resale, if in fact they were resold instead of being used in operation.

Subsection (b), proposed to be repealed by the bill, prescribes the occasion of the tax and what the tax base shall be, in the case of toilet preparations sold to the operator of an establishment of the kind above mentioned for use in its operation, or sold to him for resale but in fact used in operation. In both cases, the tax base is the price paid for the articles by the operator. The tax is imposed at the time of the sale, where the sale is for use in operation; in the case of a sale for resale, where the article is not resold but is used in operation, the tax is imposed when the article is first set aside for such use. The repeal of the subsection supplements the amendment to subsection (a), to make complete the exemption of toilet preparations sold for use or used in the operation of a barber shop, beauty parlor, or similar establishment.

EFFECTIVE DATE

The changes made in existing law by the bill would become effective on the first day of the first month which begins more than 10 days after the date of enactment.

CHANGES IN EXISTING LAW

In compliance with paragraph 2a of rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives, changes in existing law made by the bill, as introduced, are shown as follows (existing law proposed to be omitted is enclosed in black brackets, new matter is printed in italics, existing law in which no change is proposed is shown in roman):

"INTERNAL REVENUE CODE

"SEC. 2402. TAX ON TOILET PREPARATIONS

"(a) Tax.—There is hereby imposed upon the following articles sold at retail a tax equivalent to 20 percent of the price for which so sold: Perfumes, essences, extracts, toilet waters, cosmetics, petroleum jellies, hair oils, pomades, hair dressings, hair restoratives, hair dyes, aromatic cachous, toilet powders, and any similar substance, article, or preparation, by whatsoever name known or distinguished; any of the above which are used or applied or intended to be used or applied for toilet purposes, except when sold to any person operating a barber shop, beauty parlor, or similar establishment for use in the operation thereof.

"[(b) Beauty parlors, etc.: For the purposes of subsection (a), the sale of any article described in such subsection to any person operating a barber shop, beauty parlor, or similar establishment for use in the operation thereof and not for resale, shall be considered a sale at retail. The use in such operation of any article described in subsection (a) purchased by such person on or after the effective date of section 622 of the Revenue Act of 1942 for resale, shall be considered a sale at retail by such person at the time the article is first set apart for such use and at a price equivalent to the amount paid by him for the article.]"

RENT CONTROL—EDITORIAL FROM THE OMAHA WORLD-HERALD

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an editorial entitled "And on and on," having to do with rent control, from the Omaha World-Herald of January 5, this year.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AND ON AND ON

The time has not come to end rent controls, President Truman believes. He has asked for another 1-year extension, from June 30, 1950, to June 30, 1951.

In support of his demand, Mr. Truman makes two points: (1) That in areas where controls have been removed rents have gone up; (2) that there is still an acute shortage of housing for the lower- and middle-income groups.

If Mr. Truman's points are valid, there will never be an end to national rent control. It will go on and on.

Discussing point No. 1, Mr. Truman says that a survey of six typical cities showed rent increases of 13.8 to 41.3 percent after controls were lifted.

Rents were frozen in 1942, at a time when the rental index stood at 108. In cities where controls have been lifted the rental index now stands at 135 to 166.

The general cost-of-living index stood at 116 in 1942, now stands at 169.

Even in decontrolled cities, then, the rise in rents has been smaller than the general rise in the cost of living.

The way to get rental housing at reasonable prices is to remove controls, and we think Omaha is giving a remarkable demonstration of this truth. Decontrolled, Omaha is entering the biggest rental housing boom in its history. Responsible builders are planning a 432-unit apartment at Thirty-eighth and Jackson, a 700-apartment development near Twenty-fourth and St. Marys, and numerous others.

To be sure, these apartments are not specifically designed for the lower- and middle-income groups, but the people who move into them will vacate apartments and houses that will be available at reasonable rentals. This is the classic method by which low-cost housing has been provided in this country. Only in recent years has the theory that low-cost housing should always be brand new housing been advanced, and this can be accomplished only by Government subsidy. It is, we submit, as silly as it would be to insist that the man who wants low-cost transportation should not buy a serviceable 1948 Chevrolet, but a new car paid for in part by the Government.

Omaha was one of the first metropolitan cities to escape from rent control. Now, a couple of months later, it is on the threshold of its biggest housing boom. We submit those two interesting facts to the attention of the die-hard few who are still clamoring for rent control.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, the argument as to oleomargarine and butter has gone on for decades in this country, and is perhaps now going on all over the world. There is nothing new about it, and yet there is something tremendously ominous and dangerous about any final conclusion which may possibly be reached on this floor today or tomorrow, or whenever the vote is taken on this question, for it may fix the fate eventually of the dairy cow of the United States and perhaps of the world. The various merits and demerits of butter and oleomargarine have been pretty well canvassed by speakers who have given the Senate much very valuable information in the past few days. Many moral arguments have been advanced by speakers who canvassed the situation pretty well. I think we could, as a result of this debate, up to this point at least, come to some fairly clear-cut propositions that have developed. It seems to me the meat of this great controversy is the question of economic competition. That seems to be the major stimulus to the oleo people who are attempting to substitute in the diets of the American people an oil emulsion which violates all the pure-food provisions applying to other foods in the United States, and will have its net result in the lowering of the standards of the dairy industry and the possible eventual elimination, after a period of time, of much of the butter business which has brought prosperity to our diversified farm areas and to some of our specialized farm areas.

My State of Iowa has become a great butter-producing State. I do not know whether I want to dispute with my good friend, the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE] as to whether his State produces more butter than does the State of Iowa, or whether Iowa produces more than Minnesota, but I am reliably informed that today those two States produce more butter than any other States in the Union, and whether we are first or second does not make too much difference. It does mean that butter production is one of the major industries in the greatest diversified agricultural State of the Union.

I have lived all my life in Iowa, and I have seen prosperity go up and down. In the early days it was mostly down. I have seen many farmers of Iowa begin to lift their mortgages and to accumulate a little personal independence, after they began to milk cows and found a market in which they could sell their butter. In the State of Iowa we have always called the pig the mortgage raiser. It has produced a greater volume of money in the past for the relief of obligations and debts than has any other one branch of our agricultural economy.

There are reasons for that, into which I shall not go at this time, but in the days when the hog was considered to be the sole mortgage lifter of the Iowa farmer, the means of distribution of milk and the distribution and sale of butter had not been brought to the point of efficiency to which the farmers themselves have raised it at this time. Changes and developments in the standards of cleanliness and of preservation, and new means of shipment, have indeed brought butter in my State up to the point where it is one of the most stabilizing of the economic products of our farms. Iowa, unfortunately, is a State which is not close to the great fluid-milk-consuming areas which handle great quantities of fluid milk, and we had to find means and methods of disposing of our milk other than through an attempt to concentrate in the fluid-milk market. We cannot sell our Iowa milk in Washington, D. C. We would have great difficulty, with few exceptions, in the eastern part of our State, in selling large quantities of fluid milk in the city of Chicago, which is several hundred miles from the heart of our State, and our fluid milk is not subject to ready markets such as is the fluid milk in locations nearer great concentrations of population and in great cities. In my State we have had to find some way to take advantage of the natural qualities of milk in order to make its production a paying proposition and economically sound. We have found such means in the greatly increased production of butter and cheese. We also raise soybeans in Iowa. I think it is probably the second State in the Nation in the production of soybeans, which mean soybean oil. But the marketing of soybeans and its products, such as oil and mash, present far different problems and lend themselves to far easier solution and more versatile handling than do milk and milk products.

So, Mr. President, we are very much concerned about butter. In Ames, Iowa, at our State college, there has been developed one of the greatest butter-research departments in the world. Years ago the problem was realized, and we have devoted a great portion of the work of the agricultural school to the study of butter and the products which can come from raw milk. That has in large measure been occasioned by our remoteness from great centers of population. So it is very vital to us that butter, which is the outlet for the milk produced by the dairy cattle on an overwhelming number of our small family size diversified farms, shall not be given a death blow because a few concentrated corporations want to get into a highly profitable and deceptive business and substitute a synthetic product for an age-old food which has nourished civilization since man was able to domesticate the cow.

It will mean a great deal to our individual economy, of course, whatever shall be the result. But we are concerned because Iowa is a State of family-size farms and of family-size dairy producers. Almost without exception, it can be said that the average farm in Iowa, which consists of approximately 164 acres, keeps a substantial number of dairy cattle, depending entirely upon the farmer's inclination toward dairy cattle. I should say from 8 to 15 or 20 dairy cattle would be maintained. Such a farmer will not call himself a dairy specialist, nor will he claim he is in the dairy business exclusively. He is in the dairy business for two reasons: One is that he has learned throughout the years that one of the most important soil-conservation practices he can adopt is to maintain animals, and especially dairy cows, on his farm, and, secondly, he has found that the production of milk and cream, which can be turned into butter, and, more recently, the production of cheese, has brought in a check each week which pays much of his grocery bill and incidental expenses which he and his family must meet, and it levels out some of the hazards of the highs and the lows which the normal cropping of land in row crops and otherwise forces upon the farmer.

The farmer has been able to build up a stable market for his butter on the basis of cleanliness and the improvement of quality and taste of his butter, and he has been able to build up a fairly reliable and consistent price.

The two and a half million dairy farmers, most of whom are small farmers on family-size farms, are facing what may well amount to a major catastrophe, under diversified farming operations, and which may affect the diet of the public in future years beyond what we now know.

This problem has resolved itself, I think, so far as the issues immediately before us are concerned, into two things. One is the color of a synthetic product, and the other is the question of the interstate shipment of that product. The question of taxes on oleomargarine, under the pending legislation, is completely out of the picture, because under the bill before us, H. R. 2023, and under the Wiley substitute, the elimination of all taxes on oleomargarine is proposed, so that both measures before the Senate propose to eliminate all taxes on oleomargarine.

That issue, therefore, is out of this debate, because either way we go, the tax question is eliminated.

So, Mr. President, I am supporting and have supported the theory of the elimination of the tax on oleomargarine. I think we should lay the ghost of the tax at this point, because even now there is no appreciable tax on oleomargarine across the counter at the store. That is the greatest misrepresentation and distortion that has been foisted on the American people through what I regard as fraudulent advertising and ill-advised and uninformed statements. The only tax on uncolored oleomargarine, as such, to the housewives or other consumers today is a quarter of a cent a pound, plus a small license fee which the dealer or manufacturer has to pay. However, when oleomargarine is changed from its natural state, and there is an attempt by coloring it, to sell it in imitation of butter, then there is a tax of 10 cents a pound on it. But anyone in Washington may buy oleomargarine today, and, if he desires, color it at home, without any tax except the quarter-of-a-cent-a-pound tax, plus the dealer's license fee that inheres in the product itself.

But the question of taxes, Mr. President, has been eliminated from the bill and we may disregard it and consider the question of color. It has been amply developed in this debate by the various Senators who have spoken that oleomargarine is a synthetic product put together after a fashion and represented as being the equal of butter in all its uses as a spread. I cannot say that necessarily that is true or untrue. Ample chemical opinion can be obtained to the effect that oleomargarine does not have the long-range, sustained nutritional value of butter. Other opinion can be obtained to the effect that its nutritional value is comparatively equal to that of butter. So I am not sure just what the truth of the matter is. But I know that the entire foundation upon which the producers of oleomargarine attempt to operate today is a foundation of deception and an attempt to steal an age-old industry's development of a color and a method and a system of acceptance which butter has built up over the years.

No one in the butter industry objects, so far as I know, to the sale of oleomargarine on its own merits—in its natural state—but the attempt is made to stick the nose of the oleomargarine camel under the tent of the butter business, which can result in only one thing. If they are permitted to sell and ship in interstate commerce oleomargarine colored to the exact color of butter, and advertised deceptively, as the junior Senator from Wisconsin pointed out yesterday, as the "breath of the farm," or as "farm fresh," or something of that kind—if they are permitted to do that under the cover of the color of butter, the result will be disastrous to the butter industry. The advertising appropriations of the oleomargarine industry, which consists, I am told, of only about 23 companies in the United States, of which about 10 or 12 control about 65 percent of all the business, reach as high as $6,000,000 a year. If this bill, with the restrictions it removes on oleo, is passed, undoubtedly, the advertising budget will go many times higher; and with the artful methods of modern presentation, used without restraint, the oleo interests will come pretty close to driving the butter of the United States off the market entirely in the not too distant future, or will make butter, because of the competition of the low-cost oils, eventually such a luxury product that very few people, indeed, will be able to afford it.

Manifestly, at the present time, on the basis of price, butterfat at 75 cents a pound simply cannot compete with soybean oil or cottonseed oil or coconut oil at 12 or 13 cents a pound. I am told that oleomargarine is now selling for around 26 and 28 cents a pound. If we merely take the proper differential, we find that butter is selling at nowhere near the mark-up margin, percentagewise or even pennywise, at which oleomargarine is selling today to the American public, based on the cost of the basic oils which go into oleomargarine. In other words, the manufacturers of oleomargarine, made from the oils which are employed in its production, and sold tax-free to the public, should be selling oleomargarine to the public at about 17 or 18 cents a pound, rather than the 26 to 28 cents a pound they are now charging. I have no doubt that once the permission is given to the small concentration of great corporations to make oleomargarine as only a side line, before long they will have such a hold on the market that they will be able to increase the price of oleomargarine, and instead of giving the people a cheaper product, the people will be eventually paying a greater price. The profits will go into the pockets of such great world oil-controlling trusts, if you please, as Lever Bros., as was so well demonstrated by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] the other day.

Mr. President, I do not care to take a great deal of the time of the Senate in the discussion of the question of color, and I shall not do so, as other Senators have discussed it. It has been pointed out heretofore, but I think we should accentuate the fact, that the courts of the land themselves have protected color. People are heard to say that there is no exclusive right to a color, that the butter producers cannot contend that they should be protected in the color of butter, which has been standardized by usage and by the expenditure of a great deal of money and a great deal of training over the past many years, and that they have no exclusive right to the use of that color in their product. The courts of the country have decided differently. The famous Yellow Cab case has been called to the attention of the Senate repeatedly. I shall not requote the decision, but I again wish to emphasize the case. The color of soap, I believe in the Lifebuoy case, was clearly set forth as being a factor in the special development and the special attention given to that soap by the company which has been mentioned. So color has been protected.

The Federal Trade Commission undertakes today to protect one industry against apparently intended aping its product by another industry, that is, it protects a corporation, or a producer, or manufacturer against labeling or advertising by another designed to deceive the purchaser into thinking that he is buying some other brand or design or type of goods or merchandise. Such protection is being afforded every day.

In my own office this moment I have a case from my State in which the Federal Trade Commission is looking into statements and declarations on the outside of a package which I think would lead reasonable people to believe that the package was intended to deceive the purchasing public into thinking it was getting another manufacturer's product under a name under which the original manufacturer has built up a business over a period of a good many years. Such action is taken in the case of individuals in business and as to manufactured products, and it is done without patent or copyright protection.

Here we have the case of butter, which involves the economic stability of 2,500,000 small farmers. Countless farm children have been educated on the butter and egg checks, or the cream and egg checks, which have come in weekly to the farms of the United States, when other sources of revenue have been missing. Two and a half million farmers in the United States who have gone into the business of producing butter, which, as I said a while ago, is age-old, and who continue it after spending many years building up acceptable, reliable, and productive dairy herds, are facing the competition of oleomargarine, if this bill becomes law, and if interstate shipments of colored oleo are to be permitted, and promoted by national advertising in great programs which the dairy industry cannot begin to approach. We see this great segment of 2,500,000 ordinary, hard-working, family-raising people, threatened with either the necessity of losing their investments or having to change their entire method of operating their diversified farms.

Mr. President, in the discussion of the pending legislation it has been taken for granted by many of us that the yellow oleomargarine threat is one that concerns butter, and butter alone. This, however, is a misconception. The passage of H. R. 2023 would hit not only at butter, but at every other important segment of the dairy industry. I can use by way of illustration a row of dominoes. If the first domino is tipped they will all fall over. So in the case of the dairy industry. If H. R. 2023 is passed, it will touch not only butter, it will touch fluid milk, it will touch the evaporated milk industry, it will touch the dry milk industry, it will touch the ice cream and cheese industries. Those are great outlets of the dairy and cattle industry of the United States.

I have here with me, compiled for brevity, excerpts from the statements of six individuals, each of whom has a primary interest in one of the major products just named. These spokesmen were asked to appraise and evaluate what the effect would be in their particular end of the dairy industry if the bars were to be let down on yellow oleo. Their conclusions were presented last week at a joint meeting of dairy farmer groups and dairy industry representatives.

Speaking for evaporated milk was Walter Page of New York, treasurer and general manager of the Midland Cooperative Dairy Association. He pointed out that evaporated milk—like butter—is threatened by an imitation which, to the average consumer, is indistinguishable from the real product. This imitation is filled milk, in which vegetable oils are substituted for the natural butterfat. Filled milk made its first appearance about 1915 and its production grew by leaps and bounds for the simple reason that it could be produced at a cost of about 3 cents less per can than evaporated milk. It can be sold for less than evaporated milk and it nets a larger profit. Mr. Page said:

> The fraud and deception which was involved in filled milk finally resulted in the enactment of the Federal Filled Milk Act which prohibits its shipment in interstate commerce. If it were not for the Filled Milk Act the imitation would be a very serious problem—just as yellow oleo will become a serious problem if its unrestricted shipment is allowed in interstate commerce.

Mr. President, I call the attention of this body to the fact that the purpose and effect of the Filled Milk Act is identical with that of the Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment to H. R. 2023—to prevent the movement in interstate commerce of a substitute dairy product. The Filled Milk Act permits the individual States to determine whether that product can be manufactured within its borders, and there are several States which do in fact permit it. The Gillette-Wiley amendment would give to the States the same right of decision with respect to yellow oleomargarine. The Filled Milk Act has been upheld by the United States Supreme Court. I submit that in this act we have the legal, economic, and moral precedent for the enactment of the Gillette-Wiley amendment.

Mr. Page, speaking in behalf of the evaporated milk industry, concludes:

> In the evaporated milk industry we don't want to see the farmers injured by letting down the bars to imitation dairy products. One of the greatest markets for American-made industrial goods is the dairy farmers. Industrial workers would be better off to pay the oleo taxes—if they are necessary to protect against yellow oleo—and thereby keep the dairy farmer market prosperous for the purchase of industrial products.

DRY MILK CLOSELY LINKED WITH BUTTER

As for dry milk, we are all familiar with the fact that nonfat dry milk solids and butter are complementary dairy products. In the manufacture of butter from whole milk, the butterfat goes into the butter. The residue is available for drying, and the resultant product is an abundant source of the important elements which make milk the ideal food. It is obvious that any condition which would eventually reduce the volume of butter production would also affect the production of dry milk.

Gar Wagner, assistant manager of the McDonald Cooperative Dairy Co., of Flint, Mich., summarized the results as follows:

> Butter and dry milk solids are complementary dairy products—the only important milk products with this characteristic. If butter prices drop, the skim portion of the milk must carry a larger share of the load, pricewise. Yellow oleo would cut the volume of factory separated milk used for butter, and likewise nonfat solids.
>
> The only result would be higher prices for nonfat solids. The amount used in foods would be cut. Price has been the main reason why bakers and others have not used the recommended quantities of nonfat solids. Higher prices would defeat increased consumption; would cause reduction in use.

FILLED CHEESE IS ANOTHER THREAT

Cheese is another dairy product which will suffer if the oleomargarine interests are successful in having all restraints removed in the coloring of their product in imitation of butter. The position of the dairy farmers whose milk goes into cheese production was outlined by Milo K. Swanton, secretary of the Wisconsin Council of Agriculture, Madison. The chief threat to cheese producers, of course, is that once we undermine our food standards by permitting imitation products to masquerade without restrictions as genuine products, there will be open invitation for the manufacture of filled cheese—just as there will be for the manufacture of filled milk, filled ice cream, and yellow oleo. That is the vitally important point which was stressed by Mr. Swanton when he said:

> The yellow oleo issue is a battle of substitutes that involves every one of us in the dairy industry. What happens to one branch of the dairy industry faces every other branch.
> Cheese is directly concerned with what affects butter because in cheese manufacture there is a recovery of fat from whey, which goes into butter.
> Indirectly we also are concerned because we think in terms of defending the inalienable right of consumers to depend—in their choice of foods—on the senses of sight, feel, taste, smell, and hearing. Each one of these senses is violated by yellow oleo.

Mr. President, I believe this last statement deserves emphasis. In the manufacture and merchandising of yellow oleomargarine its processors are seeking to hoodwink each one of the five senses by which we mortals are able to tell the true from the false, the genuine from the imitation. They are permitted to hydrogenate their oily substances to the consistency and the "feel" of butter. They are allowed to add butter flavor to simulate butter's taste and smell. They have infringed upon our hearing with beguiling phrases that suggest green pastures and the gentle fragrance of the dairy—a far cry from the heavy stench of the oil-pressing plant. Finally, they are seeking to deceive our sense of sight by coloring their product yellow. And all to what purpose? Simply for the selfish purpose of usurping the table-spread market of America.

FLUID-MILK PRODUCERS WOULD FEEL REPERCUSSIONS

Raymond Skinner, of Memphis, Tenn., representing the Milk Industry Foundation and speaking for the fluid-milk industry, summed it up this way:

> We have less fault to find with a truly substitute product than with a camouflaged product, such as oleomargarine. Oleo relies upon dairy products for camouflage. Oleo made without the addition of milk products and butter flavor would be ordinary cooking fat. It couldn't be produced without the camouflage of dairy products.
>
> Why is the fluid-milk group interested in the yellow oleo issue?
>
> 1. Because fluid milk is one member of the dairy-products family, and anything which injures one member of the family injures all.
>
> 2. Because we believe in preserving some semblance of competitive decency.
>
> 3. Because we believe in the rights of individual communities to determine what shou'd be manufactured and sold in these communities.
> 4. Because as producers would be driven o t of the dairy industry because of unfair oleo competition, fluid-milk prices would one day go so high that substitutes for other dairy products would have to take over.

Mr. President, in connection with substitutes for other dairy products, I will say that I have brought with me a little example of what is going to happen to us and what is happening to us. If the pending bill is passed and unlimited advertising and uncontrolled interstate shipments of oleo products become entrenched in this country, it will be found that every other field of dairy production will be subject to the ersatz treatment, and dairy products will suffer, either because of prohibitively high prices or because of the industry going out of business entirely.

I have here an imitation whipping cream synthetic put on the market as "whipped topping." It has to be kept under refrigeration. It is made by a corporation in Buffalo, N. Y. It is advertised as:

> A delicious topping for desserts, salads, gelatins, and pastries.

The following statement appears on the carton:

> The pure, frozen soy cream for whipping.

Mr. President, we see that there is deception right at the outset, namely, a "cream for whipping."

Of course, Mr. President, in the past cream for whipping has always been the product of the dairy cow.

This further statement appears on the carton:

Has all these advantages:
Whips to three times its bulk.
Whips simply and quickly.
Can be rewhipped and rewhipped.
Keeps indefinitely frozen—keeps for a week at normal refrigerator temperature.
Economical in cost.
Can be whipped to any desired stiffness.
Retains its flavor and appearance.

Here is the statement, printed on the carton, of what is in it, according to the label:

Water, hydrogenated soya oil, with added propylene glycol monosterate, soy protein, corn syrup, salt, artificial flavor, artificial color.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WITHERS in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Is there anything on the package to indicate that "soy" is a bean? The Senator has not yet read anything from the label to indicate that the consumer is told that "soy" is a bean. The consumer might well think that soy is a breed of cow.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I may say to the Senator from Vermont that I am unable to find anything of that sort on the package. I am quite certain that there is no statement on the package that "soy" is a bean. The label says "soya oil" and "soy protein," but there is nothing on the label to show that it comes from soy beans, other than the word "soya" and the word "soy."

Mr. AIKEN. There is nothing on the label to indicate that "soy" is not a breed of cow, is there?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. No.

But, Mr. President, one of the significant distortions about the advertising is the statement appearing on the bottom of the container:

Pure frozen soy cream.

At one place the words "soya oil" appear, and at another place the words "soy protein" appear.

Mr. AIKEN. That is why I asked the question, because there are millions of consumers who would not know that "soy cream" was not simply a variation from Jersey cream or Guernsey cream.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. That could be.

Mr. AIKEN. It is, I think, a fact.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. But I think perhaps one of the glaring deceptions contained in the statements appearing on the carton is:

The pure frozen soy cream for whipping.

In other words, whipping cream. Those who market this article are trying to make the public believe they are putting out a whipping cream. But it is a synthetic product completely, starting with a water base, and then filled with various oils and chemical products and proteins.

Mr. President, the reason for this illustration I think is manifest, namely, that here is another product which now is actually being produced and put on the market, in an attempt to take away another great field for the sale of dairy products. It is not inconceivable that with great advertising programs and the attractive appeal which can be made to the eye and the attractive representations which can be made by the wording of the labels, the producers of such products, who make these very ingenious presentations can, with substitutes such as this "whipping cream," invade the market with great rapidity. Then, as in the case of the first of a row of dominoes, where the first domino which falls over will, in turn, cause the falling over of all the other dominoes in the row, so it will be not alone a question of butter whose market will be destroyed, and the reliability of whose market will be destroyed, but of the destruction of the markets of the succeeding dominoes, so to speak, representing the milk, the butter, and the cheese business.

I do not know when the production of synthetic cheese will begin. Perhaps it has begun. If so, I do not know it. But I did not know until a few days ago that synthetic whipping cream is now being produced to invade this market. Senators will find that the profit motive of a few concentrated corporations to invade and obtain this market for their various and diversified products will know no bounds and will be without conscience. They will steal the market of two and one-half million dairy product producers in the United States, and with little thought or care as to the economic well-being or prosperity of the great, evenly spread dairy segment of our farm economy in the United States, just so a few corporations in the United States may make a little more profit return in their business.

Mr. President, these statements are no idle threats. If we sabotage the butter industry, we undermine the entire dairy industry. The effect will not be felt tomorrow. It will be at least a matter of months; perhaps years. But so surely as we cripple one important segment of dairying, the paralysis will creep through the entire industry. More and more dairymen will go out of business or reduce their herds. They will have no alternative. And in the end, American consumers will have lost their present abundant source of dairy products and meat products—the products upon which we have built a dietary standard that is largely responsible for our present strength.

THE ISSUES INVOLVED, FROM THE BUTTER VIEWPOINT

Speaking in behalf of butter, N. R. Baker, vice president of the Fairmont Foods Co., Columbus, Ohio, stated:

In the butter-oleo controversy at least five important issues are involved: The moral issue; the economic issue; the political issue; the human element; and the issue of fraud and deception.

The moral issue is one of common right or wrong. It is certainly not in keeping with the American spirit of fair play to allow an imitation product to supplant a genuine by means of dubious practice. Yellow oleo in imitation of butter is simply the first of a long line of ersatz products that might similarly seek to supplant their natural counterparts.

In keeping with that statement by Mr. Baker, I again point out the ersatz product of "whip topping" I have just shown to the Senate.

I continue to quote from the statement by Mr. Baker:

Under the economic issue there is the contrast between the soil-improving effect of dairy husbandry and the soil depletion connected with the growing of oil-bearing crops. There is the cost involved in the resulting surpluses of dairy products, and the cost in displacing a large segment of agriculture that would be displaced by a reduction in dairy production.

The political issue is one of States' rights, and the privilege that the States alone should have in deciding such questions as whether yellow oleo should be permitted within State borders. The human element—a very important factor—is involved in the interests of several million farm families as contrasted with the interests of a few hundred families concerned with the manufacture of oleo.

The fraud and deception issue is of course fundamental. It is simply a proposition of the devious ways and means in which yellow oleo will be palmed off as butter, if its unrestricted manufacture and sale is allowed.

ICE CREAM LIKEWISE THREATENED

Aside from butter, evaporated milk, and cheese, ice cream is another dairy product that is in line for wholesale substitution, once the pattern is set and approved for yellow oleo. Ice cream is particularly susceptible of imitation, and filled ice cream will be the rule rather than the exception if the parade of imitation dairy products is allowed to get started. Robert Hibben, executive secretary of the International Association of Ice Cream Manufacturers, makes this brief and pointed comment:

Dairy products may be likened to a row of dominoes, standing on end. If one of them is tipped over, the whole row will fall down. If butter is hurt by letting down the bars on yellow oleo, every other dairy product will feel a direct injurious effect.

Mr. President, I have presented very briefly the statements of representatives of each of the important segments of dairying—evaporated milk, dry milk, cheese, fluid milk, butter, and ice cream. These statements verify what we all should know and heed—that the oleomargarine issue is not merely a controversy on butter and yellow oleo. It is an issue which involves every dairy product and every dairy farmer, and, in the end, every consumer of dairy products and meat products in America.

As I said at the outset, Mr. President, the question of taxes on oleomargarine is eliminated in this debate because, under both approaches—under House bill 2023 as it now confronts us and under the Gillette-Wiley substitute—the taxes on oleomargarine are completely eliminated. The question then resolves itself down to the point not of eliminating yellow oleomargarine necessarily from the American market but reserving to each State itself the right to say whether the manufacture and sale of colored oleomargarine shall be permitted within its borders. If a State says it may be, then, under its sovereignty and under its sovereign right, it can permit the manufacture and sale of yellow oleo. Under the Gillette-Wiley amendment, the interstate shipment of yellow oleo is forbidden, but under the amendment the question of whether they want to permit yellow oleo is left to the States. Under the Wiley amendment, however, great oleo concentration plants cannot be set up in one part of the United States and their product be shipped in interstate commerce as colored oleomargarine. It could still be shipped under its natural color, in any event, and under either bill.

So there is no proposal here to deny to the States of the Union the right to have colored oleomargarine sold, but it is proposed to preserve to the States the right to say whether it shall be manufactured and sold within their borders. In each bill the taxes are eliminated and are out of the question. But the philosophy underlying the whole program on the part of the oleo interests is that of imitation, amounting to business banditry, if you please, Mr. President, of the color of one of the greatest dietary products the human race has ever developed, namely, butter, natural butter from the dairy cows of America. If this bill passes, the movement will spread abroad, and pretty soon we shall find the American cow supplanted by the oil press and, yes, coconut oil will be coming here, and will push the cottonseed oil boys back on their haunches just as quickly as production in the coconut oil field in other parts of the world can be more highly developed. We need have no fear, Mr. President, but that Lever Bros.—so friendly now—and the other great oil-producing interests and cartels of the world will have no hesitancy in flooding the United States with coconut oil and palm oil, when their production is up to a competitive basis. In their business ruthlessness, they will disregard the interests of the cottonseed producers in this country, they will disregard the interests of the soybean producers in this country when and as coconut oil and palm oil produced in other parts of the world become sufficiently plentiful to push our locally produced oils off their synthetic markets. Although they are great pals today in this common interest, they will have no sympathy then, with those who are attempting to force an unlimited and uncontrolled sale of yellow oleo on the American public. They are great friends today. They are great buddies, but the minute the coconut oil in drums begins to roll in from the South Pacific and other places, the minute palm oil production reaches the point where its volume will warrant their doing it, they will just as ruthlessly drive the cottonseed and soybean oil producers into outer darkness, as today, with their world-wide set-up and their concentration of manufacturing plants they are trying to drive the butter industry and, therefore, the dairy industry of this country to the wall.

It is impossible to stop a dairy cow by turning off the spigot, Mr. President. It takes years to develop a dairy herd; it takes great expense to develop a dairy herd, and it takes a high degree of training and knowledge to operate successfully a dairy business, great or small. Dairy cows cannot be turned into something else if business gets a little bad—unless they are turned into the slaughterhouse. Dairymen do not have the versatility the great manufacturers have of stopping production in one line if it is uneconomic and turning their resources into another field. The dairymen cannot do that. Dairying, like farming itself, is a long-range, skilled, and financially hazardous occupation. We are today threatening the very existence of a business and an industry that furnishes a food product to the American people at a reasonable cost; we are today facing the undermining of that entire business. If we permit substitution to go on uncontrolled, we shall be doing a disservice to the American economy not only in a dietary way but in a financial way that may plague us for many, many years to come.

DEATH OF WILLIE SIX

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, though I expect to speak briefly on the pending question, I should like first to address myself to a personal matter. It was my good fortune some years ago to have been a student at the University of the South, which is situated on a high plateau in the Cumberland Mountains between Chattanooga and Nashville. The university had commonly been known as Sewanee through the decades since the War Between the States because it is located adjacent to the tiny village of Sewanee, Tenn.

Sewanee, Mr. President, is a small liberal arts university for men; it remains as one of the few such institutions in the Nation. The university's prime hope is to help her sons secure and earn for themselves an ability to think, to master any subject with reasonable facility, and to live broadly and happily in the years beyond graduation. The sons of Sewanee remain grateful for the encouragement and stimulus to curiosity provided by their university.

Not all the sons of Sewanee have been undergraduates, and some of them have never qualified for a degree. But among these, Mr. President, are to be found those whom the university and all her graduates hold in the highest possible regard, respect, and affection. One such son of Sewanee passed away yesterday, after a life of Christian usefulness, and the junior Senator from Washington has risen to express his personal feeling of loss and to extend his sympathy to the family of a man by the name of Willie Six.

From the New York Times of this morning I wish to read an obituary about a good and God-fearing Christian:

NEGRO FOOTBALL AIDE MOURNED AT SEWANEE

SEWANEE, TENN., January 12.—A Sewanee tradition passed today with the death of Willie Six, a bent and kindly old Negro who eased the aching muscles of Sewanee football players for 36 years.

Six was football trainer and confidant of his "white folks" on University of the South teams from 1909 until his retirement in 1947. The 63-year-old trainer, whose real name was Sims, died at his home after an illness of several months.

His love for the university and for his "boys" endeared him to thousands who attended Sewanee. At his retirement the tradition-steeped university observed "Willie Six Day" during homecoming festivities. More than 3,000 of his boys of years ago attended.

Among those present were six Protestant Episcopal bishops, five Army generals, a United States Senator, two members of the Tennessee Supreme Court, two college presidents, an air line president, and a National Broadcasting network president.

They presented to him a purse of more than $2,500. A plaque also was presented, along with a leather-bound scrapbook with all his newspaper clippings and more than 100 congratulatory messages.

Willie often boasted that in all his years as trainer he had never seen his team scored upon. "I always turned my head," he explained.

When Willie was asked at his retirement to pick the greatest Sewanee team of all, he replied with an answer he had used for 36 years: "It's the one a'comin' up."

Mr. President, when I heard of the passing of this good friend I expressed my own feelings in a telegram to one of the authorities at Sewanee, and, for the benefit of Willie Six's family, and because of my respect for him and because, in my official capacity as a Senator from one of the 48 States of the Union, I wish to acknowledge the passing of this real American, I should like to read the telegram into the RECORD:

JANUARY 12, 1950.

Mr. ARTHUR CHITTY,
University of the South,
Sewanee, Tenn.:

My distress over the passing of Willie Six is keen and deeply sincere. Because of what I knew him to be I have always considered him to be among the foremost Americans I have ever known. His virtues of humility, integrity, decency, and reliability were unexcelled by anyone else. I consider his comment "The best team Sewanee ever had was the team that is a coming up" to be among the priceless gems of wisdom ever uttered. Generations of Sewanee men are better men because Willie Six was their tutor in the ways of life. I am privileged to have counted myself as being a friend of his.

HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senator.

Good people, Mr. President, never die. I think both of us are in agreement on that fact. Willie Six has gone to join friends up above, where he will obviously live forever.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I should like rather briefly to address myself to the pending question.

For several days the butter-oleo question has been ably debated on the floor of the Senate. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] presented the arguments of the oleomargarine manufacturers. Answering him have been some of the most distinguished Members of this body. The RECORD of the past several days is replete with arguments, statistics, facts, figures, and phantasies—all bearing on butter and oleo.

But as I read the speeches and debates, I note a striking omission from the record. Seldom, if ever, during the debate has any Senator spoken on behalf of the consumer or attempted to present his wishes and opinions in this matter. One might almost say that the battle lines are drawn between a few great manufacturing corporations on the one side and a large group of farmers on the other. Both are fighting for the same thing—the market represented by the 38,000,000 families in the United States who daily use in their kitchen and put on their table some sort of nutritious spread. Yet up to this point there has been little reference to what these consumers themselves say about the problem now under discussion.

For the last 14 months polls and surveys of public opinion have not occupied the high place they once held in our country. No one of us, I am sure, any longer considers opinion polls to be a precise measure of public thinking. Few of us would take issue, however, with the broad results of an opinion poll, properly made by experienced, objective specialists in that field.

Within the last few days I have had an opportunity to study just such a survey. It was made by the firm of Benson & Benson, Inc., of Princeton, N. J. That firm is recognized as one of the leaders in the complicated art of determining public thinking. I am interested and surprised by some of the opinions which this survey has revealed to exist in the public mind. If the results of this survey correctly indicate the temper of the public—and I have no reason to doubt that they do so—many of us have been tilting at a windmill during these debates. Recent discussion here has been along one line. The public's thinking is along another line. It is timely that we take into account in our deliberations where the public stands on this question.

Let us take up, first of all, the basic question of how important yellow oleomargarine is to consumers. Bear in mind that I am not discussing how important yellow oleomargarine is to the producers of that commodity. I am talking about how the consumers feel. There is a great deal of difference.

A broad cross section of consumers in all parts of the country were asked this question and I quote directly from the survey:

> How much difference (aside from price) does it make to you whether or not you can buy oleomargarine colored yellow—a great deal, a fair amount, only a little, or no difference?

Here are the answers to that question: 58 percent of the people, almost 3 people out of every 5, said it made no difference to them whatsoever. Another 11 percent said it made only a little difference. That means that to almost 7 out of 10 consumers it makes little or no difference whether oleomargarine is colored yellow. There are some, to be sure, who think that the availability of yellow oleo is a matter of major importance. Twenty percent of the people replied that it made a great deal of difference to them, while another 11 percent said it made a fair amount of difference.

We could give or take a few percentage points either way. The fact remains that by a majority of more than 2 to 1 the consumers of this country are on record as saying it makes little or no difference to them whether they can buy oleomargarine colored yellow. It is very interesting to note in this connection that the housewives see almost eye to eye with the men of the family. Broken down between men and women the survey shows little difference in opinion.

I should like to pose this question to my colleagues: Do these facts testify to a mandate from the people for yellow oleo?

We are all trying to obtain an adequate answer to that question.

I say they do not, that the call for yellow oleo comes almost entirely from the manufacturers of that product. The Senator from Arkansas has stated that the sole purpose of the margarine interests was to sell more margarine. To bring that about they have intelligently and relentlessly propagandized the assumption that consumers clamor for yellow oleo. The facts of the matter now arise to confound them and to expose the propaganda as a myth.

Before I leave this one phase of the opinion survey, I want to point out another very significant finding. A similar survey was taken in May 1948 by the same organization. The results were incorporated into the testimony before the House committee considering the oleo question. At that time the survey reported that to 62 percent of the people it made little or no difference whether they could buy yellow oleo. During the year and a half that has elapsed since that first survey was taken, the oleomargarine mimeograph and countercharge machines have been grinding away furiously at a great clip. However, the current survey, which was taken in November and December of last year, showed a marked increase in the percentage of people to whom yellow oleomargarine made little or no difference. Eighteen months ago the figure was 62 percent. Sixty-two out of every 100 did not care one way or another. Today, after all the to-be-expected oleomargarine interests' denials, the figure of those who do not care one way or another whether oleomargarine is colored yellow has risen to 69 percent. If there is a mandate to be read from these figures it is, from my own point of view, along these lines: We the people are not much interested in yellow oleomargarine.

However, it is legislation we are debating, not consumer opinion. The survey from which I have quoted went to the heart of the matter, and asked the people this question, which I think is a fair one:

> At present there is a Federal tax of one-fourth cent a pound on white oleomargarine and 10 cents a pound on yellow oleomargarine, as well as certain retailers' license fees. A law has been suggested which would do these two things:
> 1. Remove the present taxes and license fees on oleomargarine, and permit the sale of white oleomargarine which could be colored at home or anywhere else.
>
> 2. Forbid the shipment of yellow oleomargarine from one State to another and let each State decide whether or not yellow oleomargarine should be made and sold within the State.
> Would you approve or disapprove of a law which would do both of those things?

It will immediately be apparent that this question describes the Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment to the oleo bill. The question is not couched in legal language, and it does not go into all the details, but it is, I believe, a fair and unbiased statement of the basic elements of the Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment. Now, let us see the public reaction. Perhaps it will be a guide to us in our continuing consideration of this question.

First of all, the survey results show that 26 percent of the people have no opinion on the proposed legislation as stated, or no opinion of any kind on any subject having to do with butter and oleomargarine. These people are in a different category from those who on preelection polls say they have not yet made up their minds. These are people who simply have no opinion. They are just not interested in the question.

But what of the other people? Fifty-two percent of all consumers would approve such a law, while only 22 percent would disapprove, or a margin of 30 percent. These figures mean that of the people who have an opinion on the pending legislation and who think of it and are interested in it, 7 out of 10 favor the enactment of the Wiley-Gillette amendment. It is pertinent again to take a look at how the housewives voted on this issue as compared with the men. After all, housewives are the Nation's buyers, especially of food products. Let us look at the record and see what the ladies have to say.

Curiously enough, more women than men approve the legislation described, which is, as I have said, virtually the Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment. Fifty-three percent of the women approve the proposed legislation as against only 50 percent of the men. Eighteen percent of the women disapprove, as against 26 percent of the men. Twenty-nine percent of all women have no opinion. That is a curious situation, whether the question is oleomargarine or anything else. Twenty-nine percent of all women have no opinion, while 24 percent of the men have no opinion and no interest. The ladies, it seems, are even less impressed by oleo propaganda than are the men. Perhaps they have seen and heard so much of it up to this time that its lack of justifiable substance has become all too clear.

The oleomargarine interests are obviously, and I think properly, afraid of the Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment. The Senator from Arkansas in his eloquent speech before the Senate on January 4 tried to discredit the amendment by ridicule, I think, by laughing at it a little bit. Adroitly the basic problem of States' rights was avoided by the Senator from Arkansas, or obscured in a smoke screen of time-worn propaganda arguments.

It would be a very rash man who would undertake to say why it is that American men and women so obviously approve the basic provisions of the Gillette-Wiley amendment. Yet it seems to me that in our deliberations we need to know, and, in fact, ought to know, the underlying reasons for the public's opinion of this proposed amendment.

Fortunately, in taking the poll, Benson & Benson asked the people why it was that they felt as they did.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield?

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Washington would like to suggest that he has perhaps 5 or 6 minutes more of his address, and would prefer to answer all questions at the conclusion; but if it is important to the Senator from Arkansas, the answer is yes, I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator is putting so much faith in polls, and, because he has just now been discussing polls, I wondered if he had heard about a poll recently taken in Ohio, which was a real poll, in which the people voted on the issue of oleomargarine, and in which they eliminated the prohibition on yellow margarine by half a million votes. Had he heard of that poll?

Mr. CAIN. As the Senator from Arkansas knows, the junior Senator from Washington has but recently returned to the Senate, and quite naturally all his time has been occupied with a study of the poll to which he is referring. I shall at the first opportunity look up and analyze the vote to which the Senator from Arkansas has just alluded.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I referred to an election. It was not a poll by Benson & Benson, or by the dairy people, at all. It was a legal, bona fide election in the State of Ohio, just last November. I thought that if the Senator was interested in polls, the result of that election gave a good indication of what the people really thought.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield?

Mr. CAIN. I should merely like to respond to the Senator from Arkansas that people think differently in different States. I am not quite certain or satisfied as to what the people in the State of Ohio are thinking about this question, but regardless of how they may think, people in other areas of the country hold the views I am expressing.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator knows that Ohio is a great dairy and agricultural State.

Mr. CAIN. I do, indeed.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It is significant that under such conditions as exist in Ohio, the majority in favor of the repeal of the oleo legislation was so great as it was. In that poll about 2,500,000 people participated. It was not a little sample ballot, in which the poll taker picks out the people he knows are favorable to what he is advocating. The poll was of everybody in Ohio.

Mr. CAIN. Is the Senator from Arkansas suggesting that all the clients of Benson & Benson, and other such fact-finding bodies, should immediately dispense with such activities because the producers of facts seek information only from their friends?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I might remind the Senator of the divergence in the result of the Gallup poll and other polls about the national election in 1948. There was a similar situation. The actual poll, which was the election, showed quite a different result from that of the hired polls, similar to those taken by Benson & Benson. I assume that Benson & Benson, whoever they are—I do not know who is meant—were employed by Mr. Holman and his group to take the poll, and I expect they were given to understand that they were to get right results.

Mr. CAIN. As a Member of the Senate on this side of the aisle, I can with greater force than can the Senator from Arkansas agree that in the election to which he refers there was quite a difference between the results of preelection polls and the results of the election itself. But I think that developing from that experience there has been a far greater degree of accuracy on the part of such fact-finding bodies as Benson & Benson. It is interesting to note that a very great number of the more stable, successful, and progressive business companies lean heavily on such results as are developed by Benson & Benson, and others in their field.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I think the Senator will admit that the poll which really cannot be contested for its accuracy is the kind of poll taken in Ohio in the election. That is much more reliable, it seems to me.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I should be pleased to yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. THYE. My only reason for interrupting the Senator at the moment is that I desire to bring to the attention of my colleagues the fact that only about 20 to 25 percent of the population of this Nation engages in agriculture. For that reason, unfortunately, we who speak in behalf of the Gillette-Wiley substitute measure are strictly a minority, insofar as the people of the entire country are concerned, but we are speaking for those who are engaged in diversified agriculture, which basically is the foundation of good soil-conservation practices. While, unfortunately, we are in the minority, we must voice our opposition to legislation which would permit a synthetic, camouflaged product to come onto the market, thereby destroying entirely the outlet for butter, a commodity the producers of which unfortunately happen to be in the minority.

I would say that the danger of destroying our agricultural economy by permitting this camouflage or substitute, so to speak, for butter to come onto the market and thereby destroy the agricultural economy of this Nation is not lessened by the fact that the voters in a State-wide election voted to permit colored oleomargarine to be sold without any restriction. If we lose the butter market the Midwest, where diversified agriculture is practiced, will have to change from dairying to some other type of agriculture. As I stated before, we certainly are going to aggravate the problems we now have with respect to surpluses with excess cotton acreages as well as excess corn acreages if we destroy an outlet, and a profitable outlet, for dairy products.

Mr. CAIN. The debate will obviously be benefited by reason of the observation just made by the able Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield?

Mr. CAIN. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Wisconsin for a comment on what the Senator from Minnesota has just said, if that is his wish.

Mr. WILEY. I wish to comment on the election in Ohio. Of the 48 counties 24 voted for the free use of color. Twenty-four counties voted against it. It is true that the proposal was carried in the State by 500,000 votes. It is also true that the Oleo Trust proceeded on the same basis of misrepresentation it has always used, and threw in everything it had in the bag, on the theory that if oleo could be colored the people would obtain cheaper oleo. The Oleo Trust persuaded what it calls the consumer class in the cities that that would be the fact.

The Senator well knows that it has been demonstrated, and it is demonstrated daily, that if the Oleo Trust takes over the so-called spread market, instead of getting a cheaper spread the consumers will pay much more for it. What is more, I have statistics showing that where yellow margarine can be bought and there should be a differential of only 9¾ cents a pound, the differential ranges from 10 to 30 cents a pound. That shows what will happen to the "dear consumer," who voted in Ohio 500,000 strong for oleo, due to the persuasive methods of the Oleo Trust, if similar action is taken elsewhere.

Mr. CAIN. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I wish to say that the Senator's observation simply comes to this—that the people of Ohio have been fooled, and apparently the implication of the Senator's remarks is that the only ones who know the facts about this subject, as to the effect of margarine on agriculture, and as to the question of whether or not the price of oleomargarine will be higher or not, if the pending bill is passed, are himself and his colleagues in the Senate. Apparently only they know the truth about that. It is a challenge to the judgment of the people of Ohio. That is what it comes down to.

The people of that State have had an opportunity to study this matter for many years—just as the Members of the Senate have and just as the Members of the House of Representatives have. On two occasions within the past 3 years the House of Representatives has voted on this very issue with a margin of 3 to 1 against the position of the Senator from Wisconsin. So apparently the only places where any persons understand anything about this are Wisconsin and, perhaps, the States of Washington and Minnesota. No one else seems to know the true situation. The implication is that the statistics which have been quoted are entirely false. There is no trust. There is nothing to support the idea that there will be an increase in the price of oleomargarine if the pending bill is passed. Knowledge of the subject, however, seems to be confined to persons living in two or three States. Everyone else seems to be ignorant on the whole question.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Arkansas must readily agree that Washington, Wisconsin, and Minnesota are extremely important areas to the maintenance of a stable and healthy economy in the United States. What the junior Senator from Washington seeks to do in a few minutes this afternoon is to present a point of view which is subscribed to very generously within the confines of the State of Washington, and subscribed to likewise, I think, by a good many ordinary American citizens, including housewives, throughout the country.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I agree entirely with that. If the subject is presented on the basis that what is involved is important to the economy of Washington, of Minnesota, or Iowa, I do not question that. I think it is important. That is a sound ground on which to base the argument the Senator is making.

Mr. CAIN. That is the foundation on which we have advanced this particular case.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I agree that that is the Senator's base. The only question is: Is the interest of four or five States to outweigh the interests of all the remainder of the States and 145,000,000 people?

Mr. CAIN. From the point of view of the States to which I have made reference it is certainly our opinion that it is good for a majority interest of the country to support the Wiley-Gillette amendment.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Is it not a fact that if any State decides and chooses, by vote or by any other constitutional process of the State, that it wants oleomargarine to be manufactured in that State, it can do so under the provisions of the substitute?

Mr. CAIN. The Senator brings up a very interesting but delicate question. I know how the Senator from Arkansas thinks on the subject of States' rights. There appears to be a contradiction between his present stand and the sentiment of the area from which he comes.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Whether Benson & Benson took the poll, or whether the voters of Ohio took the poll, or however a poll was taken, it seems to me the result of the poll is the most convincing evidence in favor of the amendment that can be offered. The people of Ohio took a stand on the question. Under the provisions of the substitute amendment the people of every State in the Nation can do what the people of the State of Ohio did, if they choose to do so.

Mr. CAIN. I think the Senator from Nebraska will agree that we should not press an obvious point. However, it does still seem to me a little strange that the Senator from Arkansas and his colleagues have gotten some distance removed from the basis of States' rights, which is to let a State have an opportunity to vote on various subjects as it pleases.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. CAIN. Certainly.

Mr. WHERRY. I know the Senator from Washington is intensely interested in housing and in the subject of rent control. One of the important pieces of legislation which was passed recently was the return of the power of imposition of rent control to the States. I am strongly in favor of permitting the local governments to handle such matters. I think one of the finest things that ever happened was the return of the centralized authority over rents to the States. I believe such action should be taken wherever possible.

Mr. CAIN. Is the Senator from Nebraska aware of the magnificent fact that since the amendment offered to the Rent and Housing Act of 1949 by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas was approved and became the law of the land seven sovereign States have said, "We know better how to regulate and control or discontinue rent control than does the Federal Government," and they have in consequence seen fit to decontrol.

Mr. WHERRY. That amendment to the law was the so-called Fulbright amendment; was it not?

Mr. CAIN. As indeed it should have been called, because the substance and the idea came from his fertile brain.

Mr. WHERRY. I happened to be one who supported that amendment. I thought the amendment was very constructive. I was glad it was adopted.

Mr. CAIN. The Senate approved it overwhelmingly.

Mr. WHERRY. That is correct. I think Congress by taking that action rendered a great service to the people of the United States of America. I certainly want to compliment the Senator from Arkansas for submitting the amendment, and debating it, and supporting it upon the floor of the United States Senate.

I submit that the same principle is involved in the present discussion. In view of the fact that the great State of Ohio took a vote on the subject of margarine, it seems to me that every other State could take similar action, under the provisions of the substitute, and that could be the final solution. Such action would seem to be absolutely parallel to the action advocated by the Senator from Arkansas when handling the bill relating to rent control during the last session of the Congress.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. If the Senator wishes to respond to the Senator from Nebraska rather briefly, I certainly shall yield to him.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I desire to respond briefly to the Senator from Nebraska. First, I want to thank the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Wisconsin for the undeserved compliment they have paid me, because I had very little to do with the matter. Both Senators did as much as I did.

I merely wish to say that the eminent Senator from Nebraska, busy as he is with his duties as minority leader, has, in my opinion, not had time to analyze the effect of the Wiley amendment, because that amendment by Federal law would provide that a State which is perfectly willing to have, by its own laws, yellow margarine, but does not have a plant, may not import yellow margarine. In other words, the amendment would provide, by Federal law, "No, you cannot buy yellow margarine, you cannot ship it in, even though your State laws say it is perfectly proper to do so." Thirty-two States, two-thirds of the States, have no prohibition, no restriction on yellow margarine, yet by the Wiley amendment it is proposed to deny half of those States the right to import this perfectly good product into those States. The Senator's amendment would say, "No, you cannot do that. If you want yellow margarine you have got to build your own plant," which is the antithesis of States' rights.

As to the foolish argument that the bill reported by the committee in any way restricts the State's product, it is absolutely not so. The Wiley amendment would prevent interstate commerce into those States which want the product. In no way does the bill try to direct or supersede the State laws on the subject.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more observation?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. If the States so vote, they can manufacture oleomargarine within their own borders. That is the point I am making. If they want it that badly, they certainly can do it.

Mr. CAIN. I think the Senator from Nebraska has made his point most ably.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I was very much interested in the comment made by my good friend on the other side of the aisle. He ignores one great fact, namely, that in two cases the Supreme Court of the United States has said that it was not only proper but legal and constitutional to stop the importation of filled milk. The only difference between filled milk and oleomargarine is there is more foreign matter in the milk, which makes it more solid.

The reason for that—the Senator has not argued, and will refuse to argue, this point—is that in his own State, where the law prohibits the serving of oleomargarine in restaurants unless there is a sign showing that oleomargarine is served there, the poll shows—and the Senator ignores this fact—that 69 out of 100 restaurants were violating the law, in his own State—meaning that the poor consumer, thinking he was getting butter, was being fed greasy oleomargarine.

Of course, Mr. President, the whole thing is based on the right of the public to have the Fair Deal.

When the Senator says that only Wisconsin and Minnesota, and perhaps a few other States, are interested in this problem——

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to interrupt at this point, to observe that in my opinion the Senator from Arkansas referred to only three States, namely, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Washington, because it happened that only the Senators representing those States were at the moment engaged in this discussion—which is not to say that perhaps 25 more Senators, had they been on the floor, might have caused the Senator from Arkansas to refer in the same terms to all the other States. I think he will take most of us in, as the vote will disclose on Tuesday.

Mr. WILEY. The point I wanted to make was that in his very fine and gentle manner of approaching a problem the Senator puts words into the mouths of other Senators and leads to the conclusion, if one is not careful, that those words may properly be attributed to those Senators.

Mr. President, our arguments have been very well put. We know there is a very large oleomargarine industry; we know that in Europe the same group controls approximately from 50 to 60 percent of all the oleomargarine manufactured outside the United States of America. We know that that group has come into America. We know that five or six of the plants control about 60 percent of the oleomargarine manufactured and sold in this country. We know that at the present moment, in States where they have the right—under State law, mind you; it is a State-law proposition—to sell white or yellow oleomargarine they are using cartel methods. In California they are following the cartel method of selling, at one point in the State, 1 pound of oleo for 15 cents and giving the right to get another pound free, whereas at another point in the same State they are selling oleomargarine at 60 cents a pound.

I wish to say that we are representing directly 2,500,000 dairy farmers, not in 1 State but in 48 States. Opposed to us is the Oleomargarine Trust. Let us call a spade a spade. We know the methods of the Oleomargarine Trust. We know how they take over territory and fix prices and "take the poor consumer for a ride."

When it is said that we are selfishly engaged in protecting the rights of the dairy farmer, we plead guilty to the charge that not only are we here protecting the rights of the dairy farmer but we are protecting the rights of all the people of the 48 States. It is a question of looking after the public welfare.

If and when the law as they want it to be changed becomes the law of the United States, Senators or Representatives who vote for it will rue the day they did so. But that change will not come about in a month or 6 months or a year. However, when Senators see a creeping paralysis spread over the great heart of the Nation, the Middle West; when Senators see what occurs there, not only on the farms but in the villages—and, after all, the farmer is the best market for the laboring man's products—when Senators see that the laboring man cannot buy, and various other things occur, then, I suppose, some other excuse will be given. Perhaps some persons will say it is the fault of the Eightieth Congress. But we will say it is the Eighty-first Congress that has stuck the dagger in the back, not only of the farmer but of all the people of the United States.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin is a very sturdy proponent of the substitute to which I have addressed myself favorably this afternoon. I can fully appreciate why the Senator from Wisconsin thinks it proper to answer so spontaneously some of the arguments which have been presented by the Senator from Arkansas because the Senator from Arkansas is a very able man. I consider him to be one of the very best informed Members of this body. So I was surprised, during the course of the present debate, to have the Senator from Arkansas say, if I understood him correctly, that he was not familiar with the firm of Benson & Benson, Inc., from whose poll or survey I have been quoting.

I should like to say to the Senator from Arkansas that Benson & Benson, Inc., was organized in 1938 by Lawrence and Edward Benson. Both those men were formerly associated with the Gallup poll organization, beginning in 1933, and they still do a great deal of the Gallup work. Some of their current clients happen to be W. R. Grace & Co., the Parker Pen Co., the Columbia Broadcasting System, the Buffalo Evening News, the Aircraft Industries Association, the Association of Reserve City Bankers, the National Tuberculosis Association, and the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis.

As the Senator from Arkansas so very well knows, in the somewhat recent past four polls were taken by Gallup on the oleomargarine question; at least, the results of those polls, which said rather conclusively that a great many American people wanted to rid themselves of the tax on oleomargarine, were referred to by the proponents of the Senator's present-day position. Those polls were taken on March 14, 1948, June 9, 1948, March 5, 1949, and May 14, 1949. I mention them only for the reason that, although the Senator from Arkansas presumably has not previously heard of Benson & Benson, Inc., he has—and very favorably—heard of Gallup. The work which went into the four polls to which I have referred was done by Benson & Benson for the benefit of Mr. Gallup, for whom the Senator from Arkansas has such a very high degree of admiration.

The only difference between the Benson & Benson, Inc., poll which I am using now and the four Gallup polls to which I have referred is that the Benson & Benson poll was designed to clarify the earlier polls with the tax issue left out.

Mr. President, a few minutes ago I raised the question of why people generally, as a result of this survey by Benson & Benson, appear to be in support of the Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment. I should like to give what appear to be their reasons.

Removal of the tax on oleo was one important reason. Next in importance was the public sentiment that the question is a matter of States' rights which each State should decide for itself. A substantial group said the law would eliminate the danger of fraud and misrepresentation. The Senator from Wisconsin has just referred to fraud or misrepresentation as they have seemingly been practiced within the State of Arkansas in connection with the oleomargarine question.

Let us take up these reasons one by one; to do so will not take long.

First, the matter of taxes on oleo: Both butter people and oleo people agree that the taxes and fees on oleo should be removed. Oleo propaganda would have us believe that the only reason the butter people feel this way is that they have no recourse—that it is a last-ditch attempt on their part to win public support for their basic position.

The record shows that is not an accurate charge. Competent legal testimony, which has never been contradicted, was presented by dairy representatives to committees of both the House and Senate. This testimony indicated that the use of the Government's taxing power was invoked by the Congress in the first place only because that was the only way to secure Federal control and enforcement.

Recent court decisions have opened up new ways to activate and fortify Government policies on oleo. Within a short time after these decisions were handed down, dairy policy voluntarily advocated the elimination of taxes and license fees on oleo and the substitution of other forms of Government control.

Personally, I see great significance in the fact that a substantial segment of the public volunteered as the reason why they approved the substance of the Gillette-Wiley amendment, their feeling that each State should decide for itself. We have seen evidence in many quarters that the people are growing resentful of the encroachment by the Federal Government into the privileges and prerogatives of the individual States. We now see that sentiment again here in connection with a question which, as the survey itself shows, is not of burning importance to a large part of the public. We are treading on the toes, not only of the respective State governments, but of the people, when we arrogate to the Federal Government powers and actions which logically rest with the States.

Mr. President, I am surprised and more than a little concerned over the public's voluntary expression, through the medium of this poll, of their fears in this regard. Many of the questions and problems which confront us in our sessions cannot and should not be delegated to the States. But the question of oleo restrictions and legislation is one which can and should be solved at the State level where sectional preferences and sectional opinions can be individually expressed and not submerged with those of other sections.

The third strong reason why the public expresses its approval of a ban on interstate shipments of yellow oleo is vital and compelling. It is the fear of fraud. The Senator from Arkansas has pooh-poohed again and again the idea that any consumer could be defrauded in view of the regulations which the bill under consideration places upon restaurant service of yellow oleo. He failed to point out—perhaps he did not know—that in his own State, where very similar restrictions now exist, 66 out of 100 restaurants surveyed by a fact-finding agency less than a year ago, passed off oleo in place of butter upon their patrons unsuspecting or otherwise.

But oleo naturally lends itself to fraud when it is colored yellow. It looks, it tastes, and it resembles closely in other respects butter, a more expensive product. Shady operators could make easy money by rewrapping yellow oleo in butter cartons. The ease with which this can be done was pointed out graphically to the House Committee on Agriculture a year ago. That committee, you will recall, reported out favorably a bill very similar to the Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment.

Consumers see the inherent possibility of fraud in oleo. They recognize the need for rigid controls of those who would defraud them of their money. It is apparent that they see a satisfactory measure of protection in a Federal ban on interstate shipments of yellow oleo and enforcement at the State level of whatever restrictions each State chooses to impose.

We are debating here a measure which affects virtually every family in these United States. Involved in the question are such basic factors as agricultural economics, corporation sales problems, and the rights of consumers to buy what they please and get what they pay for. We have heard arguments on both sides of the question, but in the last analysis, it seems to me, we should harken to the voice of the people. After all, they are the ones who consume the butter and the oleo. In the survey to which I have referred, and in a number of others, the people have spoken clearly. The survey was broad in scope, objective in purpose, and as scientifically conducted as it is possible to conduct surveys in this enlightened twentieth century. Whatever margin of error may exist in the findings—and I think we ought to say there must obviously be some margin of error—it is bound to be a matter of only a few percentage points one way or the other.

But the weight of evidence is predominate, not marginal. Seven out of ten people say it makes little or no difference to them whether or not they can buy yellow oleo. And more than 2½ times as many would approve a law which would remove present taxes and license fees on oleo and forbid the interstate shipment of yellow oleo as would disapprove such a measure.

No one yet has advanced any reasons why the Senate should disregard public opinion on this issue.

CONSULTATION AND COLLABORATION IN THE FORMATION OF INTERNATIONAL POLICY

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I am grateful to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] for allowing me to speak for a few moments on a matter not related to the subject before the Senate.

There are two matters that are giving serious concern to the people of this country. One is, will the leadership of this Nation and of the world prove itself adequate so that the world will not have to experience a third world war? The second concern of our people is whether or not we will be wise enough and adequate enough to avoid another economic depression. Recently on the floor of the Senate, in the course of debate regarding Formosa, I catechised my good friend the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], and in the debate I stated that after we had heard the Secretary of State, Mr. Acheson, in an executive session of the Foreign Relations Committee, I would have a few words to say in regard to the first of these problems, the problem which concerns our people and the people of the world. In the center of that problem there seems to be the controversy relating to Formosa.

The Foreign Relations Committee was in session today. I could not attend, but I have heard something that came out of that meeting of the committee, which more or less fits into what I had dictated before I came to the Senate Chamber. We say we are "a government of laws." That is, the United States of America is controlled by a government of laws. In the realm of foreign relations, our Supreme Court, in the case of the United States v. Curtiss Wright Export Corp. (299 U. S. 304), has said the President possesses a delicate, plenary, and exclusive power, as a sole organ of the Federal Government, in the field of Foreign Relations, a power which does not require as the basis of its exercise an act of Congress. The Court stated that the President, rather than the Congress, has the better opportunity of knowing the conditions which prevail in foreign countries; which of course is generally true. Through the State Department and the branches of the Foreign Service, information is furnished to the Executive. While this states pretty clearly where the plenary and primary responsibility in relation to foreign affairs resides, in a world which is pretty touchy and sensitive in spots, and which has been contracted through the ingenuity of man in the last two decades, and particularly in a world in which the races of men are on different intellectual and spiritual levels, I personally believe that on all international problems, at least those which are of the highest importance, the Executive can well afford to give consideration to the views and suggestions of national leaders of thought, particularly those in the legislative branch.

While I have been in Congress it has never been my policy to criticize the President in the exercise of his functions, so long as he remained in his own bailiwick and performed his own functions, but when he got over into the legislative bailiwick, so to speak, or when he has attempted to interfere with the functions of the judicial branch of government, I have not hesitated to criticize such action. Personally, I do not believe in indulging in personalities, nor do I set myself up as one who possesses any superior judgment or vision. Parenthetically, I may say there are too many visionaries in all fields. What we need is what Mr. Dooley called common sense, which he says is the scarcest commodity on the market.

I repeat that I have not hesitated to criticise action, if and when the Executive in my opinion has jumped over the fence and attempted to dominate the legislative branch, or to impose legislation on Congress, and when and if through his departments downtown we find a failure to recognize that they are but creatures of the legislative branch, who have become, through custom and through practice, the creatures of the Executive, and they become visionaries after a sort, not only in matters of legislation but in impressing the will of the Executive on the Congress. In those cases I have not hesitated to criticise, and I want to say why. It is not because I like to indulge in criticism, because in my humble opinion one of the serious infiltrations that might impair the stability of our whole society is this thing that has gone on in the last three decades, throughout the world, in which there has been a lack of checks and balances in government. Thank God we still have a government of checks and balances. We still have an independent legislative branch, but we have seen in other nations that the executive has taken over, not only the courts but the legislatures, with the result that there is a revival of ancient autocratic forms of government, under the names of fascism, communism, and statism. It is a disease which is abroad in the world. That is why I felt that I should defer any comment on Formoso and the Formosan controversy until after I had heard from the Secretary.

The Secretary made a full and complete explanation, which many Senators have read. He talked to the Press Club.

So, Mr. President, I have reached the conclusion, because I feel that the world is touchy and sensitive, that there may be a powder keg here or there which may explode, resulting in a train of consequences with we know not what result. In the interest of the general welfare and of the peace of the world I feel that it is well that the Executive should consult not only with the leaders of thought in the legislative branch, but with great leaders of thought outside the legislative branch.

So, in evaluating the Formosa problem, without any thought of giving any direction, I have made these few remarks. Elbert Hubbard, that great American philosopher, said that the person who gets the most out of a talk is the one who makes it, because he hears himself talk. So I am perhaps the one who is getting the most out of this speech. I do feel, Mr. President, that we should proceed very carefully on the Formosa question, not only as it affects Asia, but as it affects the rest of the globe, now that America has been precipitated to the top as the leading nation of the earth. Care and caution do not include weakness or indecision. In the case of Formosa it might well include, when Chiang asked for assistance, sending "brains"—military brains. Especially is this true when we consider that we are informed that some of our best military men feel that Formosa is of vital significance and have expressed a desire to do this very thing.

I am informed, although I did not have an opportunity to attend the meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee today, that it is agreed that the top echelon of the military will be called before the Foreign Relations Committee to get their reaction. I like that procedure. I should like to refer to an incident which occurred on the floor of the Senate in February 1941. That was a long time ago. At that time I introduced a resolution asking the President to submit in executive session of the Senate the Secretary of State to be examined in relation to our defenses in Hawaii and in the Philippines. Twice that month I made a speech on that resolution and I asked the significant question, "Will our fleet be caught in some harbor as was the Russian fleet in the Russo-Japanese War?" I was no prophet, and yet the question I asked was answered rather dramatically a few months later, at Pearl Harbor.

The Executive refused to produce the Secretary to be examined in executive session to give us the facts desired. If he had permitted the Secretary to make such a statement, the course of history might have been different. At least, Pearl Harbor might have been alert. If it had been alert, the course of the history of Asia would have been different and the war would have been shortened by at least 18 months.

Mr. President, I believe in such consultations. I do not believe any human brain is big enough to encompass the problems of this earth. I do not believe any group of human brains is adequate enough to tell us what is around the corner tomorrow. I think we need the direction and guidance of the Almighty. If we would compose our little differences and would sit down and consult we would make progress.

So I am happy to know, Mr. President, that we shall receive, a little belatedly, the benefit of some of the brains which I think should have been sent to Chiang.

I am also glad to note, Mr. President, that war matériel is going to Formosa for defense purposes. From what I have heard, what is needed more than anything else is what I have characterized as brains—men who can evaluate the facts, who can understand what they see, and who understand their environment.

I cannot lightly dismiss, Mr. President—and this is the third consideration—the idea of former President Hoover, which I understand is also the idea of General MacArthur. I have heard that General MacArthur thinks the Navy might perform a great containing function if it should hold maneuvers in the Pacific area. It would not be the first time America has used its Navy to do the right thing.

I have reached no conclusion on the subject. I should like to know from the brains, the men who are trained, who know the East and who know the thinking of the people of the East.

We have heard a great deal about losing face or retaining face. I sometimes wonder whether we should seek, in the national interest, to regain some of the face we have lost in the East. It would seem, from the little I have heard of the process of losing face, that it is a very significant thing to the millions of people in the East. General MacArthur understands the East, and he understands the significance of face in the East.

These suggestions are not made, Mr. President, with any sense of superior wisdom on my part, but rather in seeking to look around the corner of tomorrow to see what may take place, figuratively speaking, whether it be a week, a month, a year, or 10 years. I am seeking to look around the corner in the interest of finding the way to keep this world from going into another tail-spin of war.

Mr. President, there is another concern of our people, and that is that we shall be so on the alert and so adequate that we shall not precipitate ourselves into another depression. That question involves the subject of taxes and the subject of utilizing the Taft-Hartley law to see that our people in the Middle West and elsewhere do not freeze. It involves looking after the public interest. It also involves the question of whether one man should have the power to order out 500,000 men to create a crisis.

There is another matter which I shall discuss when I discuss the oleo segment of the question which is involved, and that is to see to it that we do not precipitate ourselves into another depression or recession.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that suggestion? It is getting pretty late.

Mr. WILEY. Does the Senator from New Hampshire desire a quorum call?

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes; I should like to have a quorum call.

Mr. WILEY. That is the reason I made the suggestion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hickenlooper	Maybank
Anderson	Hill	Millikin
Brewster	Hoey	Morse
Bricker	Holland	Mundt
Bridges	Humphrey	Myers
Butler	Hunt	Neely

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAHAM in the chair). A quorum is present.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL TUESDAY

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today it take a recess until Tuesday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMERICAN POLICY IN THE FAR EAST

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, the time has come when all of us who are Members of the United States Senate must ask ourselves the same question Abraham Lincoln asked himself in the Civil War: "Has the manhood of this race run out?"

I am sure that all those who heard the President of the United States on January 4 applauded his acceptance of the challenge of communism. I am sure that most Americans recognize communism for what it is—an international conspiracy to obtain political control of the entire world.

I am sure that most Americans recognize and are willing to meet the challenge of this violent, anti-Christian, antireligious, antihuman drive for power. The challenge has been thrust into our teeth ever since the day after a victory was won in Europe, on the President's own birthday of May 8, 1945—in fact, ever since the moment that Joseph Stalin and his gang were freed of the direct threat to their personal security which World War II represented.

But we should ask ourselves here and now: Is the threat of communism to be half acknowledged and half evaded? Is it a ruthless struggle for power in Europe, where we are giving extensive aid to other governments, and a benevolent development in Asia, where it is knocking on our back door for recognition? Or are we going to accept it everywhere for what the President says it is, and for what we all know it is? Is it one thing in Europe and another in Asia? Is it one thing in Greece and another in Formosa?

Are we to be strong and resolute in Europe and weak-kneed and dissolute in the Pacific—the very area in which we were last so disastrously attacked? Are we preparing another Pearl Harbor and are we going to stand in paralyzing indecision while we feel it come upon us? Have we manhood in Europe and none anywhere else in the world? Are we men in Europe and mice in Asia?

The miserable failure of the Munich appeasement of Hitler and the postwar appeasement of Joseph Stalin should begin to come into perspective and have some meaning to us.

Mr. President, we should have learned by this time in our history that the policy of appeasement has a natural consequence. That consequence is war. We can now see that if we had stopped Hitler in the Rhineland by firm action we would have avoided World War II, or perhaps postponed it indefinitely.

We have also learned that Joseph Stalin understands us when we speak firmly and indicate we are prepared to act with resolution. Stalin also understands appeasement and he will be appeaseable so long as we vacillate and tremble before him.

We are confronted in Formosa with another Munich and I foresee that another appeasement will eventuate in another war.

This country has had a long and honorable association with China. Contacts began in 1784 and our first mission was sent to that ancient country in 1811. Our first treaty was made in 1884. In 1899 John Hay proclaimed the doctrine of the open door, and in 1900 this Government took the lead in urging all nations to respect China's territorial and administrative integrity. This policy was strengthened further in 1922 at the Washington conference, and in 1932 a great Republican Secretary of State, Henry L. Stimson, proclaimed the famous doctrine of nonrecognition of conquest.

A Democratic Secretary of State, William Jennings Bryan, had suggested such measures in 1915. During the last war our country abandoned extraterritorial rights in China and received the plaudits of the world for doing so. In the halls of Congress the wife of Chiang Kai-shek pledged unremitting devotion to democratic principles and a democratic victory in the Far East.

What has happened since? If ever a nation—half starved and half decimated by 20 years of struggle against organized Communist and Japanese aggression—was laid low by assassination and innuendo, by charges and lies and half-truths, by a campaign of clever defamation, some from this very Hall, it was the Chinese nation and its government.

The Constitution of the United States imposes upon the Senate the responsibility of advising, consenting, and finally ratifying our foreign policy. Is it not time for this Senate to exercise its constitutional prerogative and call a halt to the shameful pursuit of a bankrupt policy in the Far East? Is it not time that, if we do nothing more, we pass a resolution of censure on this policy?

Is there a deadly blight in the Department of State that translates itself into our far-eastern policy? Are there men in that Department who work more to paralyze our policy than to devise one that will work? Do these men have a vested interest in their own errors?

I ask that all Senators consider the history of the manner in which the Chinese Government has been attacked indirectly, its confidence undermined, its faith before the world impugned, its character slandered, and its arm paralyzed in its effort to defend itself; not only to defend itself, Mr. President, but to defend all of Asia against the march of a Communist power bent on world conquest and international mental, moral, and economic slavery.

It is time that we ask ourselves who in the State Department is responsible for the divided counsels and the paralyzing indecision which has led this policy from one disaster to another, from one bankruptcy to another, from one retreat to almost ignominious rout? Thank God, it is not quite that, for there is yet time for resolute action. Perhaps the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who has done so much and labored so valiantly to construct a nonpartisan foreign policy, could best answer that question.

I recall that at the time our first bill for aid to China was reported, a certain Mr. W. Walton Butterworth, Jr., was serving as Director of Far Eastern Affairs in the Department of State. That bill was passed, and we presumed that we had furnished the funds to stiffen our policy in China. We were wrong. The attacks on the Chinese Government continued, and we continued to lose the Chinese war right here in Washington.

So what happened. Failure was rewarded. The ineffable Mr. Acheson's Mr. Butterworth was promoted for his failure, which resulted in having China turned over to the Communists. He was promoted to be Assistant Secretary of State—no less—in charge of far-eastern affairs.

How was this done? In the first session of the Eighty-first Congress his nomination to that position was reported from the Foreign Relations Committee without extensive hearings or any inquiry into his failures. His nomination was not called up for confirmation for weeks, because it was a well-known fact that a large number of Senators, including the senior Senator from Michigan, intended to oppose him.

To the detriment and almost fatal disadvantage of American foreign policy, it befell that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] had to leave for a serious operation. What happened? The State Department, lying in ambush, on the very next day called up the nomination of Mr. Acheson's Mr. Butterworth, and his confirmation was engineered.

Is that the statesmanship of a John Hay or a Charles Evans Hughes or a Cordell Hull? How far can a department of Government fall—to what low in governmental integrity and rectitude of high principles—before it shall be called into question? Are we, as Senators, to ignore a situation that as individuals we know fairly reeks of failure, while turning our backs on all principle?

The question now arises, are these errors, this confusion and lack of decision going to be compounded? Should not President Truman, as President of the United States, clean house and start all over again? Shall the Senate be required to force action through appropriations or by a resolution of censure?

Must we continue supinely to underwrite the bankruptcy of the past engineered by Mr. Acheson's Mr. Butterworth and his associates in the State Department, or shall we insist that the line be drawn somewhere with resolution?

No nation, no man, can retreat forever; but that is what the State Department advisers would have us do. First, they write off Manchuria. They then write off south China. Now, in a document, whose "top secret" classification still conceals its authorship, they send word abroad to write off Formosa. Are they ashamed to show Senators that document?

Mr. Acheson reportedly has assured the Foreign Relations Committee, in secret session, that Formosa in the hands of the Communists would have no effect on plans for the military defense of our country. I should like to hear the testimony of the Secretary of Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff on this question. They are charged with the defense of the United States. I am of the impression they would differ with the reckless statements reportedly made by Mr. Acheson in secret session in an attempt to justify his ridiculous stand.

I would remind the Senate that one of the architects of far-eastern policy, Mr. Acheson's Mr. Butterworth, was studying at Oxford University in England in 1927. I would also remind the Senate that in that same year a resolute Chiang Kai-shek, of the Chinese Nationalist Government, started driving organized communism out of China into the northwest hinterlands. He knew what communism was before Mr. Acheson's Mr. Butterworth would have been able to distinguish Joseph Stalin from Ferdinand the Bull.

For 23 years this man of Asia has stood with iron will, fighting almost with his bare hands against communism, then for years against Japanese aggression, and then against communism again. This soldier has smelled burnt powder in the field, has been wounded, has risked his life for over a quarter of a century fighting the cause of democracy. He knows communism because he has seen its unutterable brutalities and its degradation of the human spirit.

His armies pinned down more than a million Japanese soldiers in China after the attack on Pearl Harbor. Certainly we can thank God for that, if we cannot do anything more.

Are the Truman administration and the United States Senate going to continue to harbor these apostles of a bankrupt policy? Is it not time that we turned to other counsels? Have we no decisions of our own to make? Are we of the Senate impotent? Is there anyone who will rise now and insist that all is well with far-eastern policy, after we have gone from one reversal to another, from one failure to another?

Some doubtless will say that the Chinese people and armies have shown they will not support Chiang Kai-shek. My answer to this perversion is that there has not been a single, solitary example of an uprising against Chiang behind his lines through the last 3 years of defeat. If there is a man in China who is a more forthright opponent of communism, it is only necessary to name him, and many persons will support him. But I ask this question: If the President of the United States, when engaged in prosecuting a foreign-inspired civil war in a country reduced to the most desperate extremities, had been the target of such a campaign of insinuations, blackguardism, and propagandistic undercutting by the State Department of the one nation supposed to help him, could he—any President—hope to retain the confidence of his people?

I should also like to ask whether we have ever extended any real aid to China in its desperate struggle against communism? The answer is "No." Literally China asked for a sword, and we gave her a dull paring knife. And why? Because the State Department did everything within its power to paralyze and negate the Chinese program. We were hopeful a few weeks ago, when President Truman ordered a resolute policy, that the Joint Chiefs of Staff would devise one. Now we learn that the State Department has succeeded in blocking this effort.

There is a soldier-statesman in the Far East, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, who has been crying for a policy, for resolution and decision, in regard to Formosa as the last outpost against a Communist sweep into the islands of the Pacific, and into Japan, thence to our western shores.

The question should be asked here and now, Are there any guts left in this country? Any in the State Department?

Any in the administration? Any in the United States Senate?

Even now the architects of our far-eastern policy, led by our Secretary of State—who, through his assurances to Great Britain, pushed that nation into the role of pacemaker in recognizing the Communist government in China—are agitating for the recognition by the United States of this same Communist China. They propose that we come to heel with communism in the Far East and belie every principle we have preached in western Europe. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the distinguished former chairman and present chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, said we should not now take this disastrous step. How can we convince western Europe of our resolution and determination to oppose communism if we come to its heel in Asia? Yet, that is what Mr. Acheson would have us do.

How long is this blight to be endured? To the final ruin? To the inevitable conclusion of bankruptcy? The time for brave words and fine acceptances of the challenge is past. It is time for resolute decision, Mr. Acheson's Mr. Butterworth and his paralyzing politics notwithstanding.

Mr. President, I can hear those who have attempted to defend the State Department's bankruptcy in the Far East saying that I have joined with others of my colleagues in denouncing the Department without offering counterpolicies.

I am sure you will pardon me, Mr. President, if I point out to you that in 1937—some 13 years ago, when this country went blindly on, shipping scrap iron and steel to Japan—I stood on the floor of the Senate and submitted a resolution, which I supported in one of the Senate's committees, to stop the shipment of scrap iron and steel to Japan. From that day on, I have made various suggestions, as a humble Member of the United States Senate, in regard to our dealings with China and other parts of Asia.

I do not wish to appear before the Senate as a prophet, but I say that we must draw the line today, as it exists at the present time. We must save Formosa from the Communists. If bold methods are necessary, we must be prepared to use such methods.

I hear many persons say that isolationists are springing up throughout the country. The people who are turning their backs on Formosa and China are the isolationists of today. They are the appeasers of today. We have in this country a new kind of appeaser, a new kind of isolationist. Let us not try to put the tag on some of those who have been so labeled in the past, because we have new kinds of isolationists sitting in the front row. They are headed by the officials who are conducting our far-eastern policy in the State Department of the United States. That is where they are, and some day, just so surely as there is a God in heaven, those in responsible positions in this Government will have to answer to their God and to their conscience for their conduct. The man in the United States Senate who today sits still and tolerates what is now going on will also be called upon to answer.

I went through the period here prior to World War II. I know the records of some of the officials prominent in Washington at the time. I have been reviewing some of the votes in the Senate. They are interesting—so are some of the records, some of the utterances of those outside of the Senate. Let us recognize that we have a new crop of appeasers and isolationists appearing in this country. They are headed by the men who conduct the affairs of the State Department of the United States, and many others in high posts as well as those in the newspaper and radio business. I want to say I think we are doing a relatively good job in Europe, but the administration has turned its back and closed its eyes to the threat of communism in Asia, particularly in China.

Mr. President, I propose this policy for the United States. I propose that our Government give the Nationalist Government of China its unqualified assurance that whatever assistance is needed to insure its continued existence will be furnished.

We have one very vital interest in maintaining the legal government of China. There are many other reasons why we should maintain this government, but the reason which I will outline to you is in itself sufficient to justify the policy, which I propose.

We must maintain the legal government in opposition to the Communist regime in order that that government, exiled to Formosa, an island half the size of the State of Maine, may maintain contact with, encourage, strengthen, and provide assistance to, the anti-Communist forces which remain in China.

Mr. President, the weakness of our position in dealing with Russia is more and more apparent to me each day. We do not have contact or liaison with anti-Communist forces inside Russia.

While the Russian Government avails itself not only of its legal authorized diplomatic representatives in this country and all of the countries of the world as a means of gathering information and disseminating propaganda, that government likewise avails itself of a fifth column in the guise of a political party. Surely the Members of the Senate will agree with me that the Communist Party, U. S. A., is nothing more or less than an instrumentality of Joseph Stalin.

We must continue to recognize the Nationalist Government in order that the Communist Government may not establish in the United States diplomats who will provide the Soviet regime with additional eyes, ears, and sounding boards.

Only this week we have seen the eagerness of the Stalinist regime with regard to securing a seat for the Chinese Communists in the Security Council of the United Nations. By continuing to recognize the legal government of China and by furnishing that government with such support as it may need to maintain itself, we shall unmistakably indicate to the democratic people of the whole world that the United States stands firmly against the spread of communism in Asia, as well as in Europe.

There was a man by the name of Franklin D. Roosevelt who was President of the United States. He had as a Secretary of State a man by the name of Cordell Hull. Sometimes I did not agree with Mr. Roosevelt, as President, or with Mr. Cordell Hull, as Secretary. But Mr. Roosevelt, as President, and Mr. Hull, as Secretary of State, felt it was so important to the security of the country that China be kept out of the hands of a hostile power, namely, Japan, that they took certain definite, considered steps. They wrote the notes which eventually brought about the clash with Japan, when they could have maintained peace by simply allowing Japan to have a free hand in China. If Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hull were right, those who are at present running the administration are wrong. I happen to think Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hull in that instance were right. But certainly the present handling of the China-Russian situation is not consistent with the position taken by them. If the Democratic Party or the American people who supported Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hull in World War II, believed they were right, they cannot believe that those who are now shaping our foreign policy are right, because in their policies and their attitude they are proceeding in exactly the opposite direction.

It will be remembered that the time was when we were told that the Communists in China were not really Communists but were merely agrarian reformers; that actually they had no connection with Moscow. When the head of the Communist forces in China last April stood up and said, "In case of a war between Russia and the United States, we shall fight on the side of Russia against the United States," even the most stupid, even the most naive individual in this country should have been able to understand that language, and I am sure the American people did understand it.

Mr. President, Senators sitting in the Senate Chamber today, when we go from one appeasement to another, and when we turn over the greatest territory and most populous area in the world, with the greatest area of unexploited natural resources, to the Communist forces, are allowing a tragedy to occur. Some day we shall realize the truth of the old saying, "Chickens come home to roost." Let us bear in mind they are coming home.

I have made a very interesting compilation of the statements of certain of our supposedly great statesmen in the past few years about the China-far eastern policy. I hope it will not be necessary someday to rise in the Senate and read it, because it shows a record that should make the blood of every American boil to hear it read.

I hope finally that we are going to regain our self-respect, that this Nation again can answer Abraham Lincoln's question with a ringing "No, the manhood of this race has not and will not run out."

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Calling the Senator's attention to the address made yesterday by Mr. Secretary Acheson before the National Press Club, the full text of which apparently appears in this evening's edition of the Washington Star, I call his attention to two paragraphs, in one of which Mr. Acheson is quoted as follows:

> Communism is the most subtle instrument of Soviet foreign policy that has ever been devised, and it is really the spearhead of Russian imperialism which would, if it could, take from these people what they have won—what we want them to keep and develop—which is their own national independence, their own individual independence, their own development of their own resources for their own good and not as mere tributary states to this great Soviet Union.

I should like to ask the able Senator from New Hampshire whether these are not the same Communists who a few years ago the State Department, as a matter of American policy, was urging China to take into its Government in a coalition?

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senator from California is absolutely correct; they are the same Communists whom the representative of the United States who went to China attempted to force Chiang Kai-shek to take into his Cabinet as equal partners. At least Chiang Kai-shek had the wisdom to know that wherever in the world a coalition had been formed with Communists, the Communists had taken over. He could foresee disaster. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether he is familiar with another paragraph from the Secretary's speech or address of yesterday, reading as follows:

> Armed with these new powers, what is happening in China is that the Soviet Union is detaching the northern provinces of China from China and is attaching them to the Soviet Union. This process is complete in outer Mongolia. It is nearly complete in Manchuria, and I am sure that in inner Mongolia and in Sinkiang, there are very happy reports coming from Soviet agents to Moscow. This is what is going on. It is the detachment of these whole areas, vast areas—populated by Chinese—the detachment of these areas from China and their attachment to the Soviet Union.
> I wish to state this and perhaps sin against my doctrine of nondogmatism, but I should like to suggest, at any rate, that this fact that the Soviet Union is taking the four northern provinces of China is the single, most significant, most important fact, in the relation of any foreign power with Asia.

I should like to ask the able Senator from New Hampshire whether he thinks it would be possible for such a statement to be made by an American Secretary of State, if, at Yalta, we had not consented to giving to the Soviet Union something which was not within our power to give, to give it without the permission or knowledge of the Government of the Republic of China, to do it behind her back, to sign a blank check in her name, of which China had no knowledge, to put the Soviet Union in strategic positions in Manchuria and north China, which not only permitted them to arm, out of the captured Japanese stocks, the Communist forces in China, but also permitted them to carry on by devious means this final taking away from the Republic of China of these provinces to which the Secretary of State now belatedly objects? Is it not the Senator's opinion that these statements from the secret agreement which was made at Yalta were made without the knowledge of the Republic of China?

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senator is absolutely correct in everything he has said.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I should like to ask the Senator one other question. During the course of the remarks of Mr. Acheson yesterday he repeated the statements which have been made on the floor as to the vast amount of assistance received by the Republic of China. Is the Senator familiar with the American white paper, dated December 18, 1946, which is, I think, the highest authority I can quote at this time?

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The President says that of this vast VJ-day aid approximately $600,000,000 was mostly in transportation costs. In other words, that was a charge levied against the Government of China to transport troops by plane and ship from south China up into north China and Manchuria in an attempt to occupy the country. So, obviously, none of that $600,000,000 could have been in arms and munitions. Let me read this, because the memories of the people are very short, and there has been a large amount of misrepresentation as to the assistance which China has received.

The President is speaking now of the postwar lend-lease agreement. He says:

> China agreed to buy all surplus property owned by the United States in China and on 17 Pacific islands and bases, with certain exceptions.

I am reading from page 692 of the white paper statement of the President of the United States:

> Six months of negotiations preceded the agreement finally signed in August. It was imperative that this matter be concluded in the Pacific as had already been done in Europe, especially in view of the rapid deterioration of the material in open storage under tropical conditions and the urgent need for the partial alleviation of the acute economic distress of the Chinese people which it was hoped this transaction would permit.

Please listen to this:

> Aircraft, all nondemilitarized combat material, and fixed installations outside of China were excluded.

I am still quoting the President of the United States—

> Thus no weapons which could be used in fighting a civil war were made available through this agreement.

The fact of the matter is that until the Eightieth Congress passed the $125,000,000 arms implementation bill there was very little sent to the Republic of China of the type of equipment which was urgently needed in order to combat the Communists who had been fully armed by the Soviet Union out of captured Japanese stocks.

Is the Senator familiar with that matter?

Mr. BRIDGES. I am. What we shall see is a situation similar to that which resulted through the action of Chamberlain, with his umbrella, back in the days of Munich; and the time is not very far away when those who turned the great country of China over to the Communists will hand over the whole continent of Asia. There will be a sad day of reckoning.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THYE in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is opposed to the Communist form of government which is seeking to seize China, is he not?

Mr. BRIDGES. I am.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is the Senator in favor of sending an armed force over there?

Mr. BRIDGES. I would have started a definite program of military assistance a long time ago.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am talking about now. Is the Senator now in favor of sending an American army to China to oust the Communists?

Mr. BRIDGES. I am in favor of doing this——

Mr. CONNALLY. I am asking the Senator a question. Is the Senator in favor of sending an American army to China to oust the Communists? The Senator should not go off on a side issue. If he does not want to answer the question, he can say so; but he should not try to bypass my question. Please let me have an answer to it.

Mr. BRIDGES. As of today, at this minute, I am not in favor of sending an American army to China. I want to hear from our American Chiefs of Staff, General MacArthur and others—which we have been prevented from doing to date.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is the Senator opposed to the occupation by the Soviets of north China?

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is the Senator in favor of declaring war on Russia and sending an army over there because of that incident? Will the Senator please answer my question?

Mr. BRIDGES. I shall answer it, and then I shall ask the Senator from Texas some questions, which may be very embarrassing. I am not in favor of declaring war against Russia, but I am in favor of the United States of America standing up and taking a firm position. We did not hesitate to stand up in connection with the Berlin airlift. We did not hesitate to stand up in Greece. We did not hesitate in Europe at all. Our policy in Europe did not mean war. The Communists respect firmness; but what we have given them has been appeasement, all along the line.

Mr. CONNALLY. I repeat my question. Does the Senator today favor declaring war against Russia because of communism? Not next year, but now?

Mr. BRIDGES. No; I am not in favor of declaring war on Russia today; but I am in favor of taking a definite stand and drawing a line against further Communist expansion, come what may.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is the Senator in favor of sending an army to Formosa?

Mr. BRIDGES. I am in favor of sending equipment and supplies to the Chinese Nationalists in Formosa to enable them to hold that island, and I am in favor of sending an American military mission to advise them.

Mr. CONNALLY. What about the Army or Navy?

Mr. BRIDGES. If it is necessary to use them, yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator think it is necessary to send an army to Formosa?

Mr. BRIDGES. No; the Senator from New Hampshire does not think it is necessary to send an army to Formosa, but I think it is necessary for us to send supplies and equipment to the army already there.

Mr. CONNALLY. They are getting supplies.

Mr. BRIDGES. Very few.

Mr. CONNALLY. Did not the Senator see in the newspapers the statement that there are two shiploads of tanks leaving Philadelphia, paid for by money of American taxpayers?

Mr. BRIDGES. I have heard about supplies going to China which never arrived there. I have been hearing about it for years.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I beg the Senator's pardon. The Senator from California has taken up most of the time.

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Is it not true that it would be difficult for any Member of the Congress of the United States or for any of the people of the United States to come to a clear-cut decision as to what should be done in the way of a mission or the use of the Navy or the Army unless they are advised as to what is the strategic judgment of the supreme commander in the Far East, of the commander in chief of the Navy in the Pacific, and of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and that up to this hour that information has not been available either to the Members of the Congress or to the American people, and until that information is received the questions asked by the Senator from Texas cannot be intelligently answered?

Mr. BRIDGES. So far as I know, up to this moment, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and the majority of the Foreign Relations Committee itself have declined to call on the Joint Chiefs of Staff to advise us as to the situation.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator from New Hampshire want to know about bringing in the Chiefs of Staff?

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. We decided today that we would have them before the committee.

Mr. BRIDGES. I am glad the Senator has come to that conclusion.

Mr. CONNALLY. Just a moment. Do not answer the question and then run off and leave it. The Senator from California asked the Senator from New Hampshire a question regarding information, stating that we could not do anything unless we had more information. The matter of information does not seem to bother Senators. The Senator from California has been speaking for 2 or 3 weeks, and before we took a recess he had spoken on the subject. He knows exactly what to do and all about China and all about Formosa. I do not see why, with all that information running around loose, anyone should quarrel about a lack of information. The Senator from New Hampshire has told us all about everything, from Europe right down to the line, and yet he will not answer my question. The Senator says that he cannot intelligently answer the question. I agree with that, but not for the same reason.

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senator from New Hampshire can answer the question just as intelligently as the Senator from Texas any day in the week, with or without the information.

Mr. CONNALLY. More so, if he would only answer the question, but he will not answer it. He dodges. When I asked him if he wanted to send an army or a navy, he said, "Well," "but," "also," "if," "maybe," "or," "not yet," "don't know yet." When I asked him if he wanted to send a navy to Formosa, he did not answer that question. How much information does it take to enable the Senator from New Hampshire to come to a conclusion?

Mr. BRIDGES. There is no one in authority in our military forces who has come before the Senator's committee or before the Armed Forces Committee to testify. Yes, Mr. Acheson has testified, in secret session, but what does he know about the defense of Formosa?

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator will compose himself, and come to the Foreign Relations Committee meeting on the 26th of January, when we will have there the Secretary of Defense and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, we will try to give the Senator from New Hampshire an intellectual hypodermic so he will know exactly what he wants to know about that question.

Let me ask the Senator another question. As I understand, the Senator from New Hampshire is not in favor of sending an army to north China at this time to fight the Communists. Is that correct?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. He is not in favor of sending an army to Formosa?

Mr. BRIDGES. That is correct. There is an army there already.

Mr. CONNALLY. He is not in favor of sending a navy to Formosa.

Mr. BRIDGES. I would keep our Navy over there, and I would have them ready for action.

Mr. CONNALLY. Would the Senator have the Navy act?

Mr. BRIDGES. Certainly, I would not——

Mr. CONNALLY. Would the Senator have the Navy take any action?

Mr. BRIDGES. I certainly would not do what the American Government did, when the Communists started to fire a few shells, have our naval ships high-tail it out of the way so they would not be in the line of fire of the Communists. I would have American prestige stand for something.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am trying to find out what the Senator means by standing for something. The Senator would send the Navy over there. I see the Senator's point. He would send the Navy over there, but he would not order the Navy to do anything. He would put all the responsibility on the Navy. I should like to have him say what directions he would give the Navy. Would he tell them to fight? Would he tell them to go in there and clean out the Commies? Would he tell them to go there and resist any approach to Formosa? Would he go there and embrace Chiang Kai-shek to his bosom and take care of him and protect him and defend him and shed the blood of our boys, if need be? Is that what the Senator favors?

Mr. BRIDGES. So far as Formosa is concerned, the Senator from New Hampshire believes that Formosa is still a part of Japanese territory, because, although we agreed tentatively that it should go to China, there is no formal peace treaty. Therefore, Formosa is in the same position as are the islands of Japan. We have American troops in Japan today. The Chinese Nationalists were allies of curs in the Pacific, and there is no reason why they should not occupy Formosa and there is no reason why we should not supply them with the equipment and the material and the ammunition to enable them to hold Formosa against the Chinese Communists, so that at least the anti-Communists will have one place in that area from which to work toward continental China.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire a question. It seems that asking the question, "What would you do," after the horse is out of the barn, and after the decisions have been made, is leading us nowhere. I am not a member of the Committee on Armed Services and I am not a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. Perhaps if I were I would have the information I am seeking. But all those whom I have contacted cannot give it to me, so I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, who has had long service in the Senate, of which we are all proud, whether he can tell me what the policy of the Joint Chiefs of Staff was prior to the time when the President abandoned Formosa. It seems to me that is a proper question to ask. Did we have any policy? What was the intention of the administration?

I have been told that with the aid of the $75,000,000 appropriation, if the money had been placed in the hands of the Formosan Government, they could have defended themselves. I have been told some things which indicate that they have defended themselves. So I should like to know, if the Senator can inform me, what has been the policy, if there has been any? Have the recommendations of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, if they have made any, been carried out by the State Department? Have we had any advice relative to what we should do with Formosa, before the time the Secretary simply said we are going to abandon Formosa, and thereby permit a dent in our line of defense between Okinawa and the Philippines?

Mr. BRIDGES. If that information is available, it certainly is not available to the Members of the United States Senate.

Let me say that there has been ample opportunity and plenty of time when we could have done something about the Chinese situation, but the new crop of appeasers which we now have in this country, these new isolationists who have now come forth, are turning their backs upon the most populous and the largest territorial area of the world, and little by little we are seeing what is happening. Now it is the question of Formosa, next it is going to be Indochina, next it is going to be Burma, next it is going to be India, and so all down the line.

When are we going to draw the line? The Senator asks whether we favor fighting Russia. No United States Senator is going to stand on the floor of the Senate and say that we ought to declare war on Russia. But I do say we have to take a stand for definite principles, we have to draw the line, we have to say what we mean and mean what we say, and we have done neither.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is talking about our not doing anything for China. When the war came to an end Chiang Kai-shek had control and command of the entire land area of China. He had command of armies of millions of men. He had the resources of all that territory, whatever they were. He had the largest armies any soldier in China had ever had. In addition to that, he had the aid of the United States. Since the war came to an end the United States has given aid to China, through Chiang Kai-shek, in the amount of $2,500,000,000. The United States sent them arms, it sent them munitions, it sent them supplies.

I heard General Barr, who was an observer in China representing our Army, testify before our committee that the Chinese in Manchuria never lost a battle because of the lack of ammunition or arms furnished by the United States, but that the only reason they lost battles was their unwillingness to fight. If the Chinese had all been as militant as the Senator from New Hampshire, if they had all burned up with passion as the Senator from New Hampshire burns up every time he takes the floor, we would not have had this situation. They would have demolished, they would have absolutely liquidated, all the people opposing them. But they did not have it. They did not have the clarion voice of the Senator from New Hampshire ringing out along their lines. They simply did not fight. They quit.

What happened to these arms and ammunition? Soldiers in that area said the arms and ammunition, or a large part of them, were found in the hands of the Communists, that Communist soldiers had United States muskets in their hands, which we furnished the Chinese. Does the Senator know all that we did for them?

Mr. BRIDGES. I know a great deal of what we did.

Mr. CONNALLY. What is the Senator complaining about, then? Did we not do more for China than any other nation on earth?

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me to reply to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I was seeking the information from the Senator from New Hampshire. Of course, I realize the Senator from Maine can answer almost any question, but I thought I was going to twist an answer out of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BREWSTER. If the Senator does not object, I appreciate his statement about my encyclopedic knowledge. The Senator from Texas is not exactly a moron himself.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator. That is a very high estimate the Senator from Maine places upon the Senator from Texas. In other words, the Senator from Texas is only about 4° lower than the Senator from Maine in intelligence. But I should prefer to have the answer made by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BREWSTER. That is the very reason why perhaps it would be better for someone else to answer, because the Senator from Texas, while he does direct his own artillery, is not yet in charge of whatever goes on on this side, so I think it is quite fair for someone else——

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

Mr. BREWSTER. I think I have a right to the floor. I have not mixed up in this controversy, I certainly have not attacked the Senator from Texas, and I think it is quite proper that someone else on this side may be permitted to say a word.

The Senator from Texas started out with the proposition——

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas wishes to announce that he may have a word to say when his time comes and he is recognized.

Mr. BREWSTER. I think the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] controls the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. He is not doing much with it.

Mr. BREWSTER. He has listened quite a while to the Senator from Texas, which I admit is somewhat questionable, but perhaps someone else can contribute something.

The Senator from Texas said that at the close of the war Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek controlled all the land area of China. I am quite sure the Senator from Texas knows that is not true. If it were true, why was it that we sent General Marshall over there to undertake to negotiate some sort of an understanding between the Communist armies and Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek? That is No. 1 in the early inaccurate statements which I am sure the Senator from Texas inadvertently made.

Secondly, the Senator from Texas said that we supplied the armies——

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I do not care to engage in some sort of interlocutory discussion.

Mr. BREWSTER. I am sure the Senator from Texas will be recognized in his own right later, and I refuse to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THYE in the chair). The Senator from New Hampshire yielded to the Senator from Maine, and the Senator from Maine has the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. I make the point that the Senator from New Hampshire can yield for only a question; not for a speech.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. I now have the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. Take the floor.

Mr. BREWSTER. So much for the initial premise of the Senator from Texas.

His second proposition was that we gave the Chinese arms. I do not think it is necessary to labor the point. The Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] has repeatedly on this floor given the figures as to how those $2,000,000,000 were expended and what they provided.

I would rather call attention to the simple and indisputable fact that, for 10 months following the close of the war, under the advice, apparently, of General Marshall, we imposed an embargo on the shipment of any arms to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, and for the 10 months following that, according to the testimony of General Marshall before the Committee on Foreign Relations, it proved impracticable to resume the shipments. For 20 months following the end of the World War, when the Communists were being organized in Manchuria, we cut off all aid to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek.

Now, what was happening on the other side of the fence? In Manchuria sufficient Japanese arms to supply the Chinese Communist armies for 10 years of warfare were being turned over by our Russian friends to the Chinese Communists. But, of course, the mere turning over of those arms might not be sufficient. It was going to take some time to organize the Chinese Communists and familiarize them with the weapons which they were receiving, and 20 months were, prudently or otherwise, provided by the action of the United States administration in order to achieve that purpose. Meanwhile we were trying, in accordance with our then settled policy, to persuade the Chinese Government, which we recognized, to take the Communists into bed with them. That was the policy sponsored by the present administration, I presume supported by the Senator from Texas, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to try and persuade Generalissimo Chiang to take the Communists into his government.

Apparently we have gotten our eyes opened somewhat on that score, and realize that it is not quite practical to do such a thing. We finally discovered that. Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek had discovered it a long time before. He had been fighting the Communists for some 20 years, with or without our aid. He had been fighting the Japanese as well for 7 years, while we supplied the Japanese with the scrap iron and the ore with which to carry on their war.

Now let us come down to the question of fighting; as to whether the Chinese Nationalists did any fighting, and whether the outbreak in China was an agrarian revolt, as we were told. It was said the Chinese agrarians were in a great upheaval. What happened? While we were being told this story, we heard another story from the other side of the iron curtain, and, I think, from a far more competent authority than any of us had heard thus far, and that was from the leader of the Chinese Communist army, General Mao. He said that without the Russian aid he never would have been able to accomplish the conquest of China. That is his statement.

I read the words of our Secretary of State yesterday that the Chinese had simply abandoned Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, and had run away from him. That was the picture he painted. I wonder whether he knows more about that than General Mao, who paid tribute to what the Russians had done to assist him in developing the conquest of China? I thought that now almost everybody was prepared to recognize that it was chiefly, if not solely, as the result of the Russian aid that present conditions in China were brought about.

Now to the final matter of whether or not any opposition was offered and whether any fighting went on. We have heard ring through this hall, with all the eloquence the Senator from Texas can contribute to any cause which he champions, his version of that aspect of the case. Very well. Was there any fighting? Again I shall summon General Mao, who I think ought to know something about whether there was any fighting. It is his official report that there were 1,300,000 casualties on the Communist side in the course of this conquest of China. Am I to presume that these Communists committed suicide, that they had apoplexy from chasing the Chiang forces down from Manchuria? Or is it possible that 1,300,000 casualties represented the fact that some fighting was done so long as it was possible for the Chinese Nationalists to carry on, but when they faced the 20 months embargo we had imposed upon extending them assistance, they finally found themselves in the condition which I am sure the Senator from Texas regrets as much as every other American who recognizes the tragedy of Russia taking over the influence in China which we had exercised. General Mao is now in Moscow negotiating the military alliance which will organize, as he has publicly announced, all the forces that China represents with Russia against all liberty-loving peoples of the earth.

These are some of the reasons why there are many Americans who certainly are profoundly disturbed at a continuance of this same policy. I like to think of the destroyer deal. I should like to see us make available 10 destroyers to the Chinese forces on Formosa. I think that would end for a considerable time any necessity of any further action. However, I do not pose as either a military or a naval strategist, and I welcome the day when the Senator from Texas, having reconsidered his decision, will take off the lid and permit the members of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations at least, and perhaps other Senators, to have the benefit of the military opinion of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, which is indispensable to any just conclusion regarding the future course of America in this most distressing situation.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question at that point?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I wonder if the able Senator from Maine is familiar with the Wedemeyer report, which was withheld from the Congress of the United States for several years, and was not made available, though it had been requested by many Members of Congress, including, I am sure, the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BREWSTER. The Senator from Maine asked the Senator from Texas repeatedly to secure it, and I think the Senator from Texas indicated an interest in securing it. I desire to be perfectly just to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. KNOWLAND. That report, as the Senator knows, was dated the 19th of September 1947, and it was not made available, even to the Members of the Congress of the United States, until the American white paper on China was published in August of last year.

Mr. BREWSTER. And was it then a complete document?

Mr. KNOWLAND. That, of course, we do not know. I am assuming for the moment that it was, except for that part which related to Korea and other sections of the Far East. But I have been told that so far as China is concerned it is a complete document.

Is the Senator familiar with the paragraph I am about to read from General Wedemeyer's report? General Wedemeyer probably was, more than any other American, familiar with both the assets and the liabilities of the Chinese; he had served his Government well in that country; he had been an Assistant Chief of Staff of the Army of the United States and is now the commander of the Army on the Pacific coast. This is what General Wedemeyer has to say:

> Indirectly the United States facilitated the Soviet program in the Far East by agreeing at the Yalta Conference to Russian reentry into Manchuria, and later by withholding aid from the National Government.

Is the Senator familiar with that, which confirms the statements he has made?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Is the Senator familiar with this statement from General Wedemeyer's suppressed report which finally came out several years late:

> Although the Japanese offered increasingly favorable surrender terms during the course of the war—

I am now reading from page 768 of the official white paper—

> China elected to remain steadfast with her allies. If China—

I interpose to say, under the leadership of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek—

> If China had accepted surrender terms, approximately a million Japanese would have been released for employment against American forces in the Pacific.

Mr. BREWSTER. I assume that that statement was made because the Generalissimo was relying to some extent upon the pledged word of the American Government at Cairo.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I think the Senator's assumption is correct.

Mr. BREWSTER. Not knowing that Manchuria had been turned over as a Russian sphere of influence.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Without Chiang Kai-shek's knowledge or consent.

Mr. BREWSTER. And with catastrophic consequences.

Mr. KNOWLAND. So that all Americans, not only every American soldier and sailor and airman who fought in the Pacific, but those who were in Europe and would otherwise have been displaced and sent to the Pacific, should have a vital interest in the fact that had this man then heading the Republic of China accepted the blandishments of the Japanese to surrender, it would have brought about the release of 1,000,000 Japanese soldiers, who would have greatly increased the problem of this country, might have endangered the entire Pacific coast, and perhaps would have led to the fall of Australia. This is the man upon whom they have turned their backs, whom they have written off. They have practically invited, by the statements that were made the other day, the Communists to come across the channel to Formosa. We have practically said: "Come and get them. We no longer have any interest in them."

This great country of ours, which has drawn a line in Europe, which has said that it is of interest to the American people to maintain a free world of free men, has apparently said that that means nothing to us in the Pacific; that so far as the Pacific is concerned we are not interested in maintaining a free world of free men. Perhaps through some legerdemain freedom is of some importance in Europe, but it is of no importance to the people of China who are also being taken behind the iron curtain.

I think if this debate goes on, both in the Congress and throughout the country, we will be able to demonstrate with facts which have not heretofore been available, by the words of responsible Government officials, that this great betrayal has taken place, it has willfully been brought about by a small group of men in the State Department who have been willing to abandon and to sacrifice all of Asia, and present the world with a most critical situation in the future, and perhaps threaten the further security of the people of the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from California has made statements here several times to the effect that the United States has turned its back on Chiang Kai-shek—that we are traitors to Chiang Kai-shek. He used the word "treachery" a while ago.

I wish to know upon what authority Chiang Kai-shek has more claims on us than any other government has, for that matter. We have done more for him than we have done for all other governments combined, with the exception of ECA aid in Europe.

The Senator from California is burning with his passion for Chiang Kai-shek, yet he said the other day that he is unwilling to send a single soldier to Formosa, he is unwilling to send a single ship to Formosa. If these tremendous issues are at stake, why does the Senator hesitate? Why does he pause and stammer and not reply to questions of that kind?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes, whenever the Senator from Texas finishes his remarks.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, many charges and assertions are made with respect to who is running the State Department and who is responsible for the action taken by the State Department. The Senator says a little group of officials in the State Department—not the Secretary of State, not the President of the United States, who is over the Secretary of State, but a little group of men in the State Department—have been running the foreign affairs of the United States and have wiped out Chiang Kai-shek. I suppose the Senator means that two or three little fellows in the State Department get together, after adjournment every evening, and map out the policies of the State Department.

Mr. President, that is a preposterous statement. Whatever is done by the State Department is done by direction of the Secretary of State, and whatever is done by direction of the Secretary of State is done at the actual direction of the President of the United States.

I have heard statements of this kind made here from day to day by the Senator from California and by other Senators. If they have the courage of their convictions, Mr. President, why in the name of common sense do not they express them? Why do they not say, "We want to send the armies of the United States on the march into Formosa"? Why do they not say, "I want the Navy to go there to protect the vital liberties, not alone of the people of Formosa, but of the people of the United States"?

No, Mr. President, they do not have the nerve and the courage to vote their real convictions, if those are their convictions.

All of them want to go back to a discussion of Yalta. Oh, Mr. President, if we could only have had the Senator from New Hampshire at Yalta.

Mr. BRIDGES. If the Senator from New Hampshire had been there, it would not have happened—not under that authority.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine has the floor, and has yielded to the Senator from Texas. No other Senator has a right to speak.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I cannot resist an impulse to reply to the statement the Senator from New Hampshire just made. The Senator from New Hampshire has just said that if he had been at Yalta, it would not have happened. I agree—that nothing would have happened. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, it is a pity that we did not have the Senator from California at Yalta and at Cairo and at Tehran and at all the other conferences. But those things are history; they are behind us. We cannot help what has happened.

But we are here today to decide the questions which we now have before us; and the particular question before us now is Formosa. Yet the Senator from New Hampshire dares not say that he favors sending a single soldier to Formosa, notwithstanding that the fortunes of the world are involved in Formosa, notwithstanding that the destiny of the United States is wrapped up in Formosa, so we are told by some Senators. Notwithstanding all that, he will not send a single soldier or a single vessel there, to protect it from its enemies.

Mr. President, I do not want to take up any more of the time of the Senator from Maine. I know how he values the time—when someone else is using it. [Laughter.]

I thank the Senator from New Hampshire for his generosity in yielding to me.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I am the Senator who yielded.

Mr. CONNALLY. It was earlier today that the Senator from New Hampshire yielded to me.

Mr. BREWSTER. But is not the Senator from Texas going to thank me for yielding to him now? [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; if the Senator from Maine will wait, he will get his turn. [Laughter.]

The Senator from New Hampshire earlier today had the floor, and yielded to me several times, and I wish to express my appreciation to him.

Now the Senator from Maine has the floor, and has yielded to me, and I thank him also. Mr. President, I think Maine produces a good many very valuable things. Senators, lobsters, and other products of Maine are invaluable, and I am very fond of all of them.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. With the permission of the Senator from Texas, I shall yield to the Senator from California, to permit him to reply to the question asked by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, very briefly to reply to the statement made by the Senator from Texas that nothing gets out of the State Department except with the permission of the Secretary of State, let me say that of course that statement is not quite accurate, because the trial of Mr. Alger Hiss is now going on in New York, and apparently in the past some documents have gotten out of the State Department without the knowledge of the Secretary of State.

But I wish to say to the Senator from Maine and to the other Members of the Senate who are present at this time, that, of course, it is true that the National Government of China has lost some of its equipment during the course of the civil war, but China is not the only country that has lost equipment. In 5 days the Dutch Army, in World War II, surrendered, with all its equipment. In 7 days the King of the Belgians surrendered the entire Belgian Army, with all its equipment. In a matter of a few weeks the mighty French Army, which was the mightiest in Europe, surrendered, with all its equipment. The British lost all their equipment at Dunkerque. We did not turn our backs on Britain at that time, but we sent to Britain rifles and ammunition and French 75's which we had in stock or storage, and we sent other equipment to help them in the Battle of Britain.

The fact of the matter is that while some of this captured American equipment has turned up with the Chinese Communist forces, it is also true that during the war period, when we were supplying Great Britain with approximately $31,000,000,000 worth of lend-lease, we were supplying the Soviet Government with approximately $11,000,000,000 worth of lend-lease. I make no criticism of that; I think the Soviet Union was a wartime ally, and, of course, was entitled to receive assistance from us. But some of that equipment was composed of American arms, munitions, jeeps, and so forth.

The Soviets and the Communists may be accused of many things, but they have not been accused of not being good propagandists. When I was in China, I heard reports to the effect that some of the equipment which we often see shown in photographs with captions stating that the equipment had been captured at Peiping and Nanking and at other places in China by the Communists, is actually American lend-lease equipment which had first been sent by us to Russia, and subsequently was transshipped by Russia to the Chinese Communists, and has been very effectively used as propaganda in order to undermine the Government of China and give the impression that it has lost all its equipment—which is not so, because I personally have observed, on the island of Formosa and on the island of Kinmen, where the Government forces turned back an invasion of over 10,000 Communist troops, American equipment which still is in Government hands and still is being effectively used.

But they do lack a modest amount of equipment which is needed to defend the island of Formosa.

It is my judgment that the requests of the Government of China were still within the existing appropriation bills which have been passed by the Congress of the United States; and if the amount of aid requested by the Government of China had been granted, perhaps it would not even have amounted to 50 percent of the $75,000,000 appropriated for that purpose by the last Congress.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I add only one thing: The stories about the turning over of equipment to the Chinese Communists began in 1943, at the time when the matériel was being shipped over the "hump." While here in America we were reading those stories of the diversion of this equipment from the purpose for which it was designed—namely, to fight the Japs—yet the facts at that time were, as I learned from personal knowledge in flying the "hump," that the agreement with the Chinese Government provided that they were to have all the matériel and equipment above 6,000 tons a month which was flown over the "hump"; but during the entire year the amount which went to General Chennault at Kunming never exceeded 3,000 tons. That was the first thing that disturbed me when I returned to this country—to find stories, as early as that, designed to discredit Chiang Kai-shek and what was going on, when as a matter of fact they were getting nothing at all, except for what the Chinese National Airways could fly from Calcutta.

I should like to ask the Senator from Texas, if I may, one question which deals with the issue now before us. The Joint Chiefs of Staff are, I understand, to come before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations to testify, I assume perhaps in executive session or in open session. It has been stated that if military, naval, or air officers deviate from the line of authority, from the principles laid down by the Commander in Chief, then those men are apt to be disciplined by being "sent to Siberia." They are not going to be punished, we were told by Secretary Matthews, but they are going to be removed from the chain of command and sent to some other station. Are we to understand that if the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in any of their evidence, should happen to deviate from the line laid down by the President of the United States, those men are going to be subject to possible displacement or discipline as a result? I think it is an extremely important question, to which perhaps the Senator from Texas has given some consideration.

Mr. CONNALLY. What is the Senator's question? I do not know what the Senator understands.

Mr. BREWSTER. I shall try to put the question in words of one syllable for the benefit of the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. I merely want to know what the question is.

Mr. BREWSTER. I want to know whether, if the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in testifying before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, should deviate in their opinions from the policy laid down by the President regarding Formosa, they would be liable to discipline or to displacement under the principle enunciated by Secretary Matthews of the Navy?

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not the Chief Executive. I cannot anticipate all that sort of thing. I may say that the Committee on Foreign Relations has invited General Bradley and the Secretary of Defense to come before the committee on the 26th of January. They will be there on the 26th; and if the Senator will just wait out in the ante room until after they testify, I shall be glad to tell him what they testify, if necessary.

Mr. BREWSTER. Was the Senator from Texas in any way disturbed by this principle laid down by Secretary Matthews, if he noted it?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I was not disturbed. But if I were the President of the United States, or if I were Secretary of State, and one of my subordinates took violent issue with my policies, he would not remain a subordinate very long.

Mr. BREWSTER. Suppose he did not take violent issue; suppose he merely took issue; suppose, in some measure, he should deviate from some accepted line; what then?

Mr. CONNALLY. That happens all the time. Deviation does not amount to anything, if the individual is acting in good faith and is a man of integrity and a loyal individual, not someone sniping around.

Mr. BREWSTER. Does the Senator distinguish the case of Admiral Denfeld, then, as not being a sniper?

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not going into any particular case. I have no desire to mention names, and to engage in that sort of thing.

Mr. BREWSTER. Does the Senator from Texas not believe that perhaps the Joint Chiefs of Staff contemplate Admiral Denfeld's retirement?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not propose to answer questions of that kind. The Senator is trying to maneuver me into a position where he can quote me.

Mr. BREWSTER. Will the Senator from Texas not answer the question? It is a simple question. The Senator was rather insistent that some of us answer.

Mr. CONNALLY. What is it the Senator desires me to answer?

Mr. BREWSTER. I wish the Senator to answer the question.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have answered it as best I can, and the only way that I intend to answer it.

Mr. BREWSTER. The Senator does not think, then, does he, that the Joint Chiefs of Staff have any occasion to have concern about their testimony before the committee?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not know what the Joint Chiefs of Staff have in mind. They are intelligent men. If it is in the mind of the Senator from Maine, it may also be in the mind of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. They do not seem to agree on anything else, but they might agree on that.

Mr. KEM and Mr. BRIDGES addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Has the Senator from Maine concluded his remarks?

Mr. BREWSTER. I wish later to be recognized, but I yield the floor for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri has been waiting for recognition, and the Chair indicated at the conclusion of the address by the Senator from New Hampshire that, if he was on his feet, the Chair would recognize him. The Chair now recognizes the Senator from Missouri.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, the pending measure, House bill 2023, has been debated at considerable length. The issues have been discussed with learning and with a wealth of argument and illustration. I should like to discuss it very briefly and to state my position on the bill.

Mr. President, I shall support the Wiley-Gillette amendment providing, with certain safeguards, for removal of the present taxes and license fees on oleomargarine.

It is my opinion that the Federal Government should not continue to impose discriminatory taxes against this commodity, which has become an important part of the household budget of many families, particularly those in the low-income brackets where pennies count. The tax has been passed on to the consumer, and will continue to be paid by the consumer if the present law remains on the statute books.

Therefore, I am convinced that it should be repealed.

On the other hand, the millions of farmers throughout the country who are engaged in the dairying business, and the thousands of creameries, large and small, which make butter, are entitled to protection against unfair competition from this substitute product. No one should buy oleomargarine thinking it is butter. In righting one wrong, I feel very keenly that we should not commit another.

The Wiley-Gillette amendment should result in adequate safeguards for the public and the great dairy industry that means so much to the prosperity of my own State of Missouri. I shall therefore support the Wiley-Gillette amendment.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I have a few things to say regarding the pending legislation. I should like to correct the record, if the matter before us now is not the Formosan question but the pending oleomargarine bill.

Mr. President, I have in my hand an editorial from the Richmond Times-Dispatch of January 6. As everyone knows, the editor, Mr. Virginius Dabney, is one of the leading editorial writers of the country. I wish to read one paragraph from it referring to the pending so-called Wiley-Gillette amendment:

> This bit of skulduggery has been dubbed "the Wiley amendment" by punsters on Capitol Hill. If passed by the Senate, it will go down in history as one of the most disgraceful chicaneries of all time. * * * The vote on the Wiley amendment should provide us with an excellent criterion of the kind of statesmanship we have in the Senate.

It goes on to point out that the Wiley amendment is not a solution to the difficulty of which the butter producers themselves complain. I ask unanimous consent to insert the entire editorial in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A SCANDALOUS AMENDMENT

Far more than the price of yellow oleomargarine is at stake in the outcome of the Senate's vote on the House-passed oleo tax repealer—as amended by a 25-man butter bloc in the upper House. The Senate is expected to vote on their emasculated repeal bill today.

The amended version of the bill, proposed by Senators GILLETTE, Democrat, of Iowa, and WILEY, Republican, of Wisconsin, would repeal the 10-cents-per-pound tax on colored margarine, and the quarter-of-a-cent tax on uncolored—but would prohibit all interstate traffic in colored margarine. In other words the housewife could buy tax-free oleo only if it were manufactured in the State in which she resides.

This bit of skulduggery has been dubbed "the Wiley amendment" by punsters on Capitol Hill. If passed by the Senate, it will go down in history as one of the most disgraceful chicaneries of all time.

Senator WILEY and his butter men are perfect examples of the type of politician referred to in the oft-quoted epigram of John Morley's: "Those who would treat politics and morality apart will never understand the one or the other."

Tools of the butter bloc, these men are determined to prolong the controversy indefinitely and at any cost to the millions of housewives who now pay 10 cents more than they should for each pound of oleo they buy.

The vote on the Wiley amendment should provide us with an excellent criterion of the kind of statesmanship we have in the Senate.

There is no more excuse for prohibiting the interstate shipment of colored margarine than there is for a law compelling a housewife to buy no butter except that produced within her own State.

The oleo people have science, the consumer, and justice on their side. The consumers demand the repealer; the scientists have proved that the fats in oleo are palatable, nutritious, and wholesome; justice demands an end to this intolerable discrimination. If the butter bloc can defeat all three, the only conclusion to draw is that those Senators who vote for the Wiley amendment are impervious to the appeal of justice, blind to scientific evidence, and deaf to the plea of housewives—something to be recalled when these gentlemen offer for reelection.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I should like to point out that the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY], as amended by the Aiken amendment, is the proper approach to the problem, if the dairy interests are really concerned about misrepresentation and fraud. It undertakes to set down a proper criterion for advertisements and labeling, the labeling being covered in the Pure Food and Drug Act, and to provide very severe penalties for violation of the act. If there is any proper approach, that is it. The approach of the Wiley amendment, which simply prohibits the shipment of yellow margarine in interstate commerce, does not accomplish that purpose in any way. It is an infringement upon existing rights of the States which permit without restriction yellow margarine to be sold within their borders. There are 32 States which permit it, and only 15 of those States have plants within their borders; one of those being Missouri, the State of the Senator who has just spoken. Of course, that State is large enough to support a plant, but in such States as Nevada, Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico, which have relatively small populations, I do not think it would be economically possible to support a plant. The Wiley amendment in effect denies the people of those and other States the right to buy yellow margarine, whereas today they can buy it freely—of course, paying the tax. In my judgment it would be much more sensible to leave the existing legislation in effect than to adopt the Wiley amendment, which would put up a complete barrier against interstate commerce in yellow margarine.

Mr. President, I have before me an article which appeared in a trade journal that is no way related either to the margarine industry or the butter industry. It was in the Refrigeration and Air Conditioning News, of Detroit. It was a guest editorial by E. N. Guild. I desire to read it, as I think it high-lights one of the interesting phases of this situation:

IT COULDN'T HAPPEN HERE—OR COULD IT?

(A guest editorial by E. N. Guild)

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—Author of this grand satire is both an electric refrigeration executive and a farmer. He's also fed up with socialistic government. All people in the gas-appliance industry, we trust, will understand that he's lampooning political gas bags, not the gas industry.)

The national controversy over the butter and margarine situation has given me a great inspiration. This is such a wonderful idea that it should have been thought of long ago, and the fact that nothing previously has been done reveals that American industry has failed to exercise the privileges and opportunities open to it under our enlightened form of government.

I am identified with the electrical industry, and have a strong preference for this form of energy; so strong that over the years I have convinced myself that all other forms should be abolished, in the public interest. Naturally, I use an electric range in our kitchen at home, and being completely satisfied that it possesses greater merit than competitive gas ranges, I propose, with the help of others, to launch a program that would protect consumers against this dangerous and inferior rival. The plan is justified on grounds that we—the electric interests—are larger; we represent more employees (voters) and cut a bigger figure in the national economy than the gas group. Therefore, we need special advantages to help us maintain our position of leadership. Otherwise we might not prosper, and that would be a bad thing for the country. Adversity might also cause us to transfer our political allegiance to another party.

The silly legal point concerning combinations in restraint of trade need not bother us. The dairy industry blazed the trail a couple of generations ago when our democracy was far less liberal and advanced than it is today. In fact every one of the items in this proposal is copied from the laws of our fair land with respect to butter and margarine competition. Hence, its absurdity cannot be said to exceed that of the sources from which it was derived.

I propose that Congress enact the following legislation:

1. A measure to require that all gas ranges be produced with black finish, for purposes of identification. Since the natural color of ranges is white, the white finish should be set aside for our exclusive use, in perpetuity.

The objectives of our group, although quite pure and altruistic, may be misunderstood. So we will form an association, and invest money in well-placed gratuities, coupled with an educational campaign to show that unless gas ranges are painted black, millions of unsuspecting people are likely to purchase them in the mistaken belief that they are genuine electric models. However, we may not get away with this because of stupid opposition, and are prepared to agree on a generous compromise. Our competitors may have the right to supply a can of white paint with each black range, provided that the repainting shall be done in the customer's kitchen. Heavy fines should be imposed for noncompliance.

2. Stiff taxes should be imposed on the gas-range industry to curb the growth of this public menace. Since the Government is looking for additional sources of revenue, such a proposal would likely meet with great favor. Moreover, the tax structure can be devised cleverly, with a low rate on gas ranges in black and a high rate on gas ranges which may employ in defiance our natural white finish. Therefore, if proposal No. 1 is considered discriminatory or impractical, we can accomplish our purpose with equal effectiveness by the tax route. First, slap on a Federal processing tax. This should be about 30 percent of the retail price for white gas ranges. Second, soak the manufacturer an additional $600 per year for a special license to engage in such an unlovely business. Third, State taxes should be imposed, and although these will vary tremendously in different parts of the country, the variation in itself adds to the nuisance value. Fourth, let us arrange a wholesaler's tax of $200 per year for handling black gas ranges and $480 per year for white gas ranges. Fifth, stick the retailer $6 for handling the black stuff and $48 for white.

It should be obvious to any sensible person that these special taxes are reasonable and fair. They act as a deterrent to the manufacture and sale of spurious goods.

3. For the purpose of discouraging gas-range sales still further, we should require each dealer to placard his establishment with warnings in letters not less than 3 inches high stating that the proprietor is trafficking in gas ranges. The phrase "caveat emptor" need not be added, the implication being sufficient. Likewise each restaurant where a gas range is used must have the dining room well-posted in a similar manner for the guidance of patrons who may wish to be forewarned.

4. Compel the manufacturer to identify each gas range with "caution" labels on all exposed surfaces, ostensibly as a protective measure, but also to transmit to the buyer a distinct impression that the product is a substitute for something better.

5. None of the foregoing restrictions or special taxes should apply to our electric-range industry. Furthermore, we require and are entitled to the following privileges:

(a) The right to finish our product in black, or any other color, at the factory, should we find that our natural white color is losing ground in consumer preference.

(b) A subsidy from the public, paid through the Federal Government, so that we cannot lose money in producing our merchandise. This financial support is not to be repaid during periods of prosperity or scarcity when profits may be excessive. The gas-range manufacturers shall not qualify for such benefits.

The advantages of my proposal should instantly be apparent to all persons skilled in modern political science. The economy of this country has become so complex that our industry should no longer be expected to struggle along, virtually alone, on the basis of free enterprise. By applying a special kind of analysis, not out of accord with the philosophy of our present administration, one may easily be persuaded to believe that our purposes are completely unselfish.

Combinations, it seems, refer to a sinister plot between two or more individuals or groups to restrict or injure the trade of others. But it has been demonstrated that when one of the conspirators happens to be a branch of the Government, nothing in the Constitution can stop them, for each discriminating action is taken through the creation of new laws and regulations. With reference to our margarine problem, Jefferson, or any of our early American patriots, would have stormed these barricades with flags waving, for they were sworn to defend our democracy with their "lives, fortunes, and sacred honor."

Ah—but I shrug—Thomas Jefferson is dead.

Mr. President, the opponents of the bill have made much of the argument that the giant Unilever Co. is going to monopolize the margarine business, if the bill is passed. Their remedy for this is to pass the Wiley substitute, which would require a separate margarine plant in each State. Testimony before the committee indicated that this would require a great deal of expense on the part of margarine manufacturers. It seems reasonable to assume, in the scramble for the construction of these margarine plants, that Unilever might well lead the way, since, according to some Senators, they have unlimited resources and are determined to take over the margarine business in the United States.

Of course that argument is wholly without foundation. The facts are that the Jelke Co., which was bought by the Unilever Co., produced less than 5 percent of the total production. There is very keen competition within the industry. The part which is completely inexplicable otherwise is the question of the price, under the existing conditions. If there were a monopoly, certainly there would not be such an enormous spread—more than 50 percent—between margarine and butter. It is not characteristic of monopolies to take so much less than the market will bear. There is no explanation of the fact that today white margarine is selling at less than one-half the cost of butter and that yellow margarine sells at approximately half the cost of butter.

As I have stated before, they cannot have it both ways. If there were a monopoly, the price would be much higher than it is today in the normal course of events. The reason why margarine is so cheap is that the ingredients are cheap, which is admitted, and the competition within the industry is so strong that the price is kept within a very reasonable margin of profit.

It was recently stated on the floor of the Senate that the cost of a pound of margarine is 9 cents. That is ridiculous. Refined cottonseed oil is selling in the neighborhood of ten and a half cents a pound. That is the raw product. The cost of soybean oil is slightly more than that amount a pound, so that the actual cost of production must be in the neighborhood of 18 or 20 cents a pound. The price from the manufacturer to the wholesaler is approximately 1 or 2 cents above that, and by the time it gets into the hands of the retailer it is sold at a price in the neighborhood of from 31 to 33 cents a pound, depending upon the distance of the manufacturer from the market, the freight rates, and so forth.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator has just been speaking of the cost of oleomargarine, apparently on the basis of the cost of certain domestic oils, principally cottonseed oil, soybean oil, and such items. But would it not be possible for the manufacturer of oleomargarine to considerably lower the cost of his finished product by using some of the 400,000,000 pounds of coconut oil coming in annually from the Philippines, in addition to similar items from other countries where the cost of labor is very low?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It might be possible. The evidence is very clear in the hearings held last year and the year before that the manufacturers of margarine, in the total production in this country, utilize no oils other than the ones mentioned a few days ago, namely, cottonseed oil and soybean oil, which are the two principal oils accounting for approximately 95 percent. Corn oil and peanut oil are also used. Some margarine is made for special uses, a small amount for export, in which some of the other oils are utilized. But I think that is simply a straw man which is set up.

It has been stated for a number of years that practically 95 percent of the production of margarine is made from domestically produced cottonseed oil and soybean oil. I suppose much the same statements can be made of milk as have been made regarding oleomargarine. A great many persons have been convicted of putting water in milk and selling the product for pure milk. That would necessarily lower the price. I suppose it might be argued that we should abolish milk because someone might put water into it. We read in the newspapers now and then that someone has been convicted of adding water to milk.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator will yield further, I should like to say that there can be no question about the importation of 400,000,000 pounds of coconut oil from the Philippines, and there cannot be very much question about what it can be used for. I am perfectly willing to admit that it is used principally in the manufacture of soap, but it can be used in oleomargarine when competition reaches the point where the manufacturer of oleomargarine needs to lower his cost a little further in order to accomplish certain purposes. There is no doubt that an increased percentage of the 400,000,000 pounds of coconut oil, supposedly imported for the manufacture of soap, could be used in the manufacture of oleomargarine.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. As I said a moment ago, I suppose that would be possible, but I think it would be unwise. The oleomargarine manufacturers are relying upon the quality of their product, and if one observes the curve of sales during the past 6 or 8 years, I think he will agree they are entirely justified in doing so.

The principal reason why the sales have increased so substantially is that oleomargarine is an excellent product. Everyone knows what he is buying, and is quite content to buy it, and all the evidence which has been submitted indicates that it is a nutritious food. We are familiar with the experiments which have been conducted by several leading scientists, in institutions such as the University of Illinois, the University of Southern California, and others, to which I wish to make reference a little later.

A good deal has been said by the proponents of the Gillette-Wiley amendment with regard to the spread between yellow and white margarine. In order to get first-hand information on that point, I made inquiry of manufacturers with respect to their policies, and I have the replies here. I shall not read all of them, but I should like to read several into the RECORD at this time, as samples. I have replies from most of the principal manufacturers, and I should like simply to read some of them as illustrative of what they all contain.

I have here a telegram dated January 3, from New York, addressed to me, which reads as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., January 3, 1950.

Senator J. WILLIAM FULBRIGHT:

In response to your request please be advised that we manufacture one brand of uncolored margarine and the same brand of yellow margarine. The price differential between the two charged by us is 10 cents per pound for solid brick, yellow margarine and 11 cents per pound for yellow packed in 4 quarter-pound prints. These are and have been our differentials. Should the Federal taxes on margarine be repealed our selling prices will be reduced by the saving in taxes.

THE BEST FOODS, INC.,
S. CYPRESS,
Director of Sales Coordination.

Here is one from a well-known firm, Armour & Co. I do not know why that one company was not particularly mentioned. Indeed, Armour & Co. makes more margarine than do Lever Bros., but for some reason or other it was presumed by some Senators that Lever Bros. had a little more dramatic appeal. This is dated Chicago, Ill., addressed to me, and reads:

CHICAGO, ILL., January 3, 1950.

Senator J. W. FULBRIGHT,
Senate Office Building:

In response to your request we have two brands, Mayflower and Sweet Sixteen, white and colored. Our cost price to dealers on colored 1-pound packages is 10 cents per pound over regular white, 11 cents over regular white on colored quarters. This has been our pricing policy over the years. In event of 10-cent color law repeal our price on colored will be reduced 10 cents per pound.

ARMOUR & CO.,
E. C. LEWIS.

Here is one from my own State, Osceola, Ark., which reads:

OSCEOLA, ARK., January 3, 1950.

Senator J. W. FULBRIGHT,
Senate Office Building:

In response to your request for information regarding brands and prices, we manufacture 10 brands of margarine in white solids and colored quarters. Differential between regular white and colored quarters is 10 cents per pound, and it is our definite intention to pass this differential on to the trade in the event taxes are repealed.

OSCEOLA FOODS,
L. C. B. YOUNG, President.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. In the early part of the afternoon I obtained a unanimous-consent agreement that at the conclusion of business today the Senate would take a recess until 12 o'clock on Tuesday. In talking with some Senators they have indicated that they thought the hour of meeting should be 11 o'clock. I ask unanimous consent to modify my request and make it 11 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. That does not involve changing the order as to the hour of voting, does it?

Mr. LUCAS. No.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It is also understood that the time from 11 until 1 o'clock will be equally divided between the Senator from Wisconsin and myself, is it?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Arkansas is correct.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay the Senate too long, and I shall not read all the telegrams I have. There are two others, from well-known companies, which I am sure are highly responsible companies. I know the Senator from Nebraska, for example, is well acquainted with one of them, and I am quite sure he has confidence in them. I speak of Swift & Co., of Chicago. They say:

CHICAGO, ILL., January 3, 1950.

Senator J. W. FULBRIGHT,
Senate Office Building:

In response to your request for information as to how many brands yellow and white margarines we quote also the price differential at wholesale level. We quote one brand Allsweet in 1-pound solid white or 1 pound solid or quarter-pound yellow. Price differential between solid white and solid yellow 10 cents to cover tax. Between solid white and yellow quarters 11 cents to cover tax and increased packaging costs. This differential has been constant since we first began sale of artificially colored margarine.

SWIFT & CO.,
W. L. PRENTISS.

One other, and then I shall desist. This is from a different part of the country, from Sherman, Tex. It reads:

SHERMAN, TEX.

Senator J. W. FULBRIGHT,
Senate Office Building:

In reponse to your request we wish to advise that we manufacture only two brands of margarine. Namely Meadolake and Hollandale margarine in both colored and uncolored. The uncolored is packed in 1-pound solid prints, the colored is packed in 1-pound solid prints and four one-quarter-pound prints. We do not pack margarine in the squeeze bag. Our differential in price between the colored and the uncolored has been uniform since we first started making colored margarine. The differential in price on the colored in 1-pound solid prints is 10 cents per pound above the price for the uncolored. The differential in price on the colored and four one-quarter-pound prints is 11 cents per pound above uncolored. When the present Federal taxes are removed on margarine we expect to reduce our price on colored margarine 10 cents per pound.

MRS. TUCKERS FOODS, INC.

Mr. President, there is no reason whatever to believe that all these companies are simply standing by expecting to raise the price of all their margarine 10 cents. It is assumed, and I believe, and I think it is undisputed, that these companies are making a reasonable profit on their product today. They would, indeed, be very foolish to raise the price if they had the power to do so, as has been alleged by the supporters of the Wiley amendment. They would be simply creating a situation which would invite into the field additional competitors. That always happens if an industry is left free, if it is not Government controlled. It would be a very stupid move on their part, because there is no evidence that there is a monopoly. If, as the allegation is, there were a monopoly in this field, then of course that would be attacked. It should already have been attacked, and those who believed it should have preferred charges that it was a monopoly in violation of the Sherman Act. Of course there is no evidence whatever in support of such an allegation, or some representation would have been made long before now.

There is no more active group in the whole United States than the butter organization, and I must say, in spite of the fact that I differ with them, that I have never encountered a group better organized or more efficiently represented in Washington than that represented by Mr. Charles Holman. I pay him that compliment, because he is the most resourceful man who has ever represented any important industry in this Capital. After all, this is the first time in 60 years in the history of this legislation that the Senate has ever agreed even to vote on the subject. Ever since I have been a Member of the Senate, certainly for at least 3 years, we have been attempting in every possible way to get a vote, and I can hardly believe that even today we have finally agreed to vote on one part of it, a substitute, in this instance.

The fact that there has been no prosecution of the margarine industry as a monopoly cannot be ascribed to the fact that they do not have efficient and alert representation in Washington. That in itself is quite sufficient proof that there is absolutely nothing to the allegation that there is a monopoly or a trust in this business. It would long since have been broken up if anything of that sort had existed.

Of course, the additional fact, and the one that is unanswerable, is the existing price of the product. It is cheap. In fact, that is its only real crime. The only real offense it is guilty of is that it is so cheap that it embarrasses its competitors, that is, the butter makers.

Mr. President, as I have said, I have telegrams from some 15 or 20 other companies, but they are exactly the same in substance as those I have read. They support the view, or they all agree, that with the elimination of the tax the price of yellow margarine will be the equivalent of the existing price of the white margarine, at least within approximately a cent. There is the cost of the coloring, which is very slight, but it would justify a differential at least half a cent or a cent.

Mr. President, I have several editorials pertaining to this subject which I think are of great interest. I have a great many more in my office than I have here, but I have selected a few of them from the States in which it is alleged great harm will result from the repeal of these taxes.

The foremost State, or certainly among the first few States in the productio of butter, is Iowa. I have in my hand an editorial from the Reinbeck (Iowa) Courier. I wish particularly to call it to the attention of the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], who is a cosponsor of the amendment. The editorial was published on April 21, 1949, when it was expected that a vote would be had on this subject. I shall read only a few sentences from it to illustrate that even in Iowa, a great butter-producing State, its people do not all see the matter in the same way. I read as follows:

COLORED OLEO AND COLORED BUTTER

Now comes Senator GUY M. GILLETTE, who states that he is sponsoring a bill to repeal the tax on oleo. GILLETTE'S bill will be very much the same as other bills that have been introduced, and almost identical with the Grainger bill, with exception that GILLETTE'S bill will not permit shipment of colored oleo in interstate commerce.

How silly this is. Just as well include butter in the bill also. There is no such thing as natural golden yellow butter, with the exception of about one month in the year. All butter is colored with the same ingredients that oleo is colored with.

I remind Senators that this editorial is not from an Arkansas or Alabama newspaper. It comes from an Iowa newspaper. Reinbeck is a rather small town in Iowa, too. It is not one of the great metropolitan centers. I continue to read:

The writer—

That is of this editorial—

had a vital interest in a creamery in Reinbeck some 14 years ago, in fact we had money invested in it, and we know whereof we speak. Our creamery purchased a lot of butter coloring, and it was used aplenty.

It just strikes us a little out of line to legislate one group against another. In fact this legislating business has grown to an extent where it has become dangerous. Nothing can bring about one of the so-called isms as quickly as too much legislation.

Southern Senators can be expected to fight to a finish this oleo bill restricting their farmers and industries of the Southern States making oleo. It seems to be O. K. to ship colored butter down South, but wrong to send colored oleo up North. Such a law.

I think that editorial is especially appropriate to appear in this debate, because I believe many persons who are so very eager in their support of the Wiley-Gillette amendment are also on other occasions very much inclined to complain of the great amount of Federal regulation in other fields. So I think that the views of this writer are especially appropriate.

I have another editorial published in the Denver (Colo.) Post of June 2, 1949. Denver is in another State which has been quite prominent in its support of the Wiley-Gillette amendment and, I may say, of all the restrictions in the past upon oleomargarine. The editorial is as follows:

A FAST-FADING HOPE

Two months ago the House of Representatives passed a bill removing the special Federal taxes on oleomargarine—taxes which penalize one product for the benefit of a competing product—butter.

The House action raised high the hopes of consumers. At last, they thought, people who could not afford the luxury of eating tax-free butter would no longer have to pay discriminatory taxes for the privilege of eating margarine.

They figured the most un-American of all taxes—a tax based on inability to pay instead of ability to pay—was about to be repealed.

In the last 2 months, however, butter manufacturers, backed by many misguided dairy farmers, have been bringing great pressure on the Senate to keep the bill passed by the House from becoming law.

Their campaign has been so successful that congressional observers now list the margarine-tax repeal as having but slight chance for Senate action, particularly if Congress sticks by its intention of closing up shop on July 31.

Popular demand for repeal of the margarine tax has been unmistakable. There is no reason why this discriminatory tax should not be repealed at this time. It is poppycock for anyone to pretend that the dairy industry rests on such a shaky foundation that only a 10-cents-a-pound tax on colored margarine stands between it and economic collapse.

That is exactly the point I think I have proved by the statistics as to the use of milk in this country, especially by the statistics coming from Wisconsin, the State of the proposer of the amendment. I maintain, just as the editor of the Colorado Post maintains, that it is poppycock to say that the whole stability and prosperity of the dairy industry depends upon this 10-cents-a-pound tax on margarine and the restrictions which have existed upon margarine through the years. The editorial continues:

It is time the Senate quit playing farm-vote politics on a matter which affects the food budgets of millions of families from coast to coast.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an editorial published in a Wilmington, Del., newspaper under date of April 29, 1949.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EMANCIPATE OLEO

Back in February the State senate passed the bill to permit the sale of yellow oleomargarine in Delaware. In the house the proposal has been reported favorably out of committee, but somehow has been held back from a vote. It now looks as if the house will act on the bill this week. Because we think yellow oleo should be emancipated in Delaware, as elsewhere, we urge that the local restrictions be removed without further delay.

The same bill which removes the restriction on color also sets up adequate safeguards for the buying public. Colored oleo would be clearly labeled as such in packages. Before serving it, a restaurant must identify it on the bill-of-fare or must announce its use on a placard in full view of all customers.

The present Federal 10-cent tax on yellow oleo, along with other Federal taxes on manufacture and sale of oleo, is pretty sure to be repealed in the United States Senate. Such a repealer has already passed the House of Representatives. There is no doubt that President Truman and Governor Carvel will give final approval.

We would not be happy in urging the emancipation of margarine if we thought the dairy industry would suffer in any serious degree. We think it will not, especially in Delaware and the Eastern Shore.

But we could not, in any event, support legal discrimination in favor of one good product and against another. It then becomes discrimination against the consuming public. Housewives have the right to buy yellow margarine, if they wish, without penalty.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I see the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] present in the Chamber. For his benefit, and because he has given such close attention to the subject, I wish to read into the RECORD an editorial published in the Muncie (Ind.) Star of May 25, 1949, as follows:

PUT MARGARINE BILL TO VOTE

The bill to repeal discriminatory Federal margarine laws passed the House by a 279 to 89 vote and was approved by the Senate Finance Committee. But it has got no further than that. It now is in danger of becoming the victim of a legislative log jam. That was its fate last year.

The margarine measure is the target of threats of filibusters and crippling amendments. This hurts its chances for consideration on the floor of the Senate, which has a lot of work to do before the July 31 adjournment date. This situation, however, will not excuse the Senate from putting the bill up for vote. Both the House action and public opinion, which has been shown to be heavily in favor of the measure, obligate the senior legislative body to go on record.

I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point two editorials from the Wichita (Kans.) Beacon, an editorial from the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal, an editorial from the Louisville (Ky.) Times, another from the Bath (Maine) Times, one from the Pontiac (Mich.) Press, one from the Marquette (Mich.) Journal, and one from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wichita (Kans.) Beacon of June 16, 1949]

FOUR HUNDRED THOUSAND RETAIL GROCERS JOIN THE DEMAND FOR THE REPEAL OF THE OBNOXIOUS TAX ON MARGARINE

Four hundred thousand retail grocers have joined the public demand that Congress remove the discriminatory and obnoxious tax on margarine. They reflect the desire of the 40,000,000 Americans with whom they are in constant contact.

These 40,000,000 people include farmers, laboring men, the white-collar group, and others who purchase and consume margarine as one of their nutritious foods. As margarine buyers they do not want to continue to be penalized by paying a premium on margarine.

These merchants meet day in and day out their margarine customers. They know public sentiment. They are reflecting the sentiment of their patrons—the American public—when they declare that the margarine tax should be removed immediately.

Retail grocers do business with the rich and the poor alike. Their patrons represent people in all categories.

These merchants want the tax penalty taken off margarine in the general interest. They see it as an unfair discrimination which the people should not be compelled to endure.

Senators, the people want action by you that will result in the repeal of the margarine tax. Ten thousand retail merchants, in the convention of the National Retail Grocers Association, have passed a resolution for the tax repeal. The House of Representatives already has passed a similar measure.

Why does the Senate stand in the way of the tax repeal? The grocers represent no group or clique. They speak for the public—their customers—and they know what they are talking about.

After all, Senators are elected to serve the people. The tax repeal is a service the people want and demand of their legislators. Surely, no Senator wants to continue to keep this hardship on the people he represents.

The margarine tax is a hardship and injustice on people who can afford to buy margarine but cannot afford to buy butter. They plead with you, their Senators, to remove this uncalled-for, obnoxious, and penalizing tax.

[From the Wichita (Kans.) Beacon of May 19, 1949]

REPEAL OF THE ANTIMARGARINE TAX LAWS IS DUTY THE UNITED STATES SENATE OWES ITS CONSTITUENTS

The hour of the show-down on whether the unjust and discriminatory taxes on margarine are to be repealed or remain in effect is at hand. This is the most critical period the groups that favor the elimination of this penalty on a popular and necessary food have faced.

The bill that would remove the taxes on margarine has passed the House of Representatives. It is soon to be called up for debate and action in the Senate. Many Senators have not made up their minds on this greatly important matter to the consumers of margarine—and they are legion.

The laborers, white-collar groups, farmers, tenants, and others should have the opportunity to buy margarine without having to pay obnoxious taxes on it. They want the Senate to relieve them of this burden.

Foods, and especially margarine, are taxed to death by Federal taxes and State taxes, including a sales tax. Taxes are responsible for the high prices now being charged for foods.

Why should the Federal Government pick out margarine for special taxation when there are so many other kinds of taxes? It simply is not understandable. The American people should have the right to buy their foods, including margarine, without having to pay obnoxious taxes on them.

Passage of the margarine antitax bill by the Senate should come without any crippling amendments that may be offered.

Many consumers cannot afford to buy butter. Their health demands the fats margarine provides. This nutritious and economical food should not be denied them because of a prohibitive tax.

Justice and plain common sense demand that the people should not be deprived of a food they want, need, and are able to buy.

The Senate should be quick to follow the example set by the House of Representatives and by passing the measure for the removal of margarine taxes do its constituents an invaluable service. The Senators owe such action to the people they were sent to Washington to serve.

[From the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal of May 22, 1949]

MARGARINE TAX REPEAL IS UP TO THE SENATE

It is true that the Senate faces decision on unprecedented international affairs at this session. It is true that more legislation is awaiting enactment or in the process than can possibly be completed before adjournment.

But this is no reason why an act repealing the Federal tax on margaraine should be allowed to die. The bill has been passed by the House of Representatives. It has been reported favorably by the Senate Finance Committee. The tax on margarine is everywhere recognized as a discrimination foisted on the housewife by the dairy lobby. There is no serious pretense that it is a revenue measure. It has weighed unfairly on those housekeepers who must watch pennies—and there are millions—for 60 years.

At the last session of Congress the repeal bill passed the House, was approved by the Senate Finance Committee, and died with the Eightieth Congress. If Members of the Senate know the wishes of those who elected them, it will not happen again this year.

[From the Louisville (Ky.) Times of May 21, 1949]

ANOTHER RUN-AROUND SIMPLY WOULDN'T DO

Unquestionably the Senate's docket is heavy. But this can be no excuse for putting aside a bill which has passed the House by as many votes as 279 to 89. A tally like that shows that a large majority of the people really want a bill enacted into law. The bill in this case is that repealing discriminatory Federal taxes on oleomargarine. It has not only been approved overwhelmingly by the House but also by the Senate Finance Committee, so that the way is clear for final action.

Yet word comes from Washington that there is serious danger final action will not be taken before Congress recesses, probably in midsummer. This danger exists because some of the dairy-State Senators, led by ALEXANDER WILEY, a Wisconsin Republican, threaten to filibuster in case the margarine bill is taken up. With so much important business before the Senate and time now so precious, such a threat is, of course, potent.

However, those Members who would vote for the bill if given a chance, and they are a majority, ought to meet it squarely. If an arbitrary and unfair competitive advantage for butter over margarine is more important to the dairy-State Senators than the Atlantic pact and other vital matters on the Senate's agenda, then let these men be compelled to proclaim that fact to the Nation and endure public obloquy for a while.

Last year a margarine tax bill was passed by the House by 260 votes to 106, approved by the Senate Finance Committee and killed by threat of filibuster in the Senate in the last-minute rush. We don't think most of the housewives of the land and the farmers who produce vegetable oils will take meekly another such run-around as that.

[From the Bath (Maine) Times of April 22, 1949]

MARGARINE VERSUS BUTTER

For 63 years the Congress of the United States has fought margarine. The recent procedure in Congress withdrew taxes on margarine, and provided for its sale as foodstuff with occupational licenses of $600 on manufacturers, and less amounts for the wholesale and retail trade. On top of that the lower branch of Congress voted that all margarine served in all public eating places must be served in triangles, which one legislator remarked, "would be like a baby's diaper."

Another lawmaker called it a new pyramid club. The House also included in the bill a provision that eating houses serving margarine must display large signs advertising that fact.

Butter is a popular element of our best food, but the power of its political strength is another matter. There is now more margarine used daily than at any previous time. The butter people have claimed a monopoly on yellow coloring. The color of margarine does not seem to affect the spread.

Numerous articles of all kinds of foods carry colors that distinguish them from other fruits, meats, greens—and even bread sails under different colors. All of which goes to show that the color of different foodstuffs exists in the open market. The coloring of margarine is a very queer issue for the dairy interests and politicians to stand on. In the open markets and homes hundreds and thousands of people tell you: "I can't tell the difference in the taste of margarine and butter."

[From the Pontiac (Mich.) Press of June 8, 1949]

NO MRS. MILQUETOAST

A bill to repeal the deliberately discriminatory Federal taxation of oleomargarine has passed the House and won approval by the Senate Finance Committee. It has taken years to get that near to justice for the consuming public in this matter. Yet dairy State Senators now threaten to filibuster the bill to death, counting on their threats to discourage a Senate move to bring it up for action. Maybe these Senators know on which side their bread is buttered. It is certainly not the same side for the majorities in Congress and the political party responsible for Congress' record. If these others know what is good for them they will see that the bill comes to a vote, filibuster or no filibuster. If they want to hear a real talkfest, let them ask any intelligent housewife her opinion of penalty taxation of the substitute she turns to when she thinks butter is too high.

[From the Marquette (Mich.) Journal of May 20, 1949]

MARGARINE TAX

There has been widespread editorial support for repeal of the Federal tax on margarine. Last year a repeal bill passed the House but died in the Senate. A similar major measure presented at this session may succumb to the same fate. This no doubt is the reason the National Association of Margarine Manufacturers is urging the press to call attention to the present status of the bill.

The House has passed the repeal measure by an overwhelming vote. The Senate Finance Committee also has reported it out of committee. But the association reports, "We are informed that measure may be shunted aside."

There is no valid reason why the Senate should not vote on this bill at this session, and vote favorably. The margarine tax is discriminatory. It never should have been imposed under pressure from the dairy lobby some years ago. It has stood as a horrible example of misuse of the powers of taxation.

Congress has done little to correct the inequities of Federal taxation. The least it can do at this session is to knock out the margarine tax.

[From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of May 24, 1949]

OLEO REPEAL IN DANGER

The American people want the discriminatory taxes on oleomargarine repealed. A small block of dairy States in the Senate want them retained. There is a good chance that the tactics of this minority group and the Senators who represent them will be able to thwart the will of the majority.

The oleomargarine tax repeal bill was passed by the House in April by a thumping majority. It has been reported favorably by the Senate Finance Committee. All that remains to end this 63-year-old excise levy is approval by the Senate. The measure, however, is now caught in the legislative log jam, and unless the leaders of the upper House act to extricate it, history will repeat itself and the bill will die, as it did at the last session.

Prospects for its consideration by the Senate are marred by the threat of Senators JOHNSON of Colorado and WILEY of Wisconsin to filibuster and amend the bill to death if it is called up for a vote.

There are two sound reasons why such tactics should not be permitted to prevail. The oleo tax is an unjust discrimination against the margarine industry. It is an arbitrary and unnecessary charge which increases living costs. The oleo taxes include a levy of 10 cents per pound on colored margarine at retail, a manufacturers' tax of $600 a year, a wholesalers' tax of $480, and a retailers' tax of $48. Repeal of these levies would reduce the cost of margarine by more than 10 cents a pound—a substantial saving for the average family.

The situation should be a challenge to America's housewives. They can, if they will, make it clear to the Members of the Senate that they want the oleo-tax-repeal bill put on the calendar for prompt consideration and approval.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I have also an editorial from the Great Falls (Mont.) Tribune. That is an interesting editorial. The Montana Senators have been very active in their opposition to the pending legislation. I ask unanimous consent to have that editorial printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARGARINE CONTROVERSY PERSISTS

Montana has a producing interest in the controversy over regulation and special taxes on oleomargarine. That producing interest is on the side of butter. But, as is the case in other States, Montanans have a consumer interest in margarine because of the price differential. A good share of the butter-oleo controversy has approached the ridiculous, and the average observer is inclined to disregard most of it and put the whole thing down as a trade fight, pure and simple.

Ever since Congress failed last year to complete action on a repealer of taxes on margarine the butter people have been devising new strategy. Now they are recommending an outright prohibition on the making of yellow margarine. Most consumers are likely to agree with this sentiment, expressed in a recent New York Times editorial:

"The heavy discriminatory tax on colored margarine has not succeeded in preventing the greater use of uncolored margarine, and neither will an unfair prohibition against coloring margarine at the plant, which the butter lobby now proposes in a 'compromise' last-ditch fight in which they have at last conceded failure on the unfair tax.

"The public wants its margarine colored yellow. The butter producers themselves use artificial coloring, at least at certain seasons, to make the appearance of their product more attractive. The housewife is entitled to emancipation from the chore of coloring her own margarine in the kitchen. Enact whatever law is necessary to protect the consumer, in store or restaurant, from being deceived as to what he is buying. If the decline of butter consumption affects the public welfare through unduly depressing the dairy farmer's income, then let us attack that problem directly through general legislation."

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I have another editorial in which I believe the Senators from Nebraska might be interested. It is published in the Omaha World-Herald under date of April 4, 1949. I am sure the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] and the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] know well the importance and good judgment of what I believe is the only, and surely the leading, newspaper of Omaha and, I presume, the leading newspaper of the State of Nebraska.

Mr. BUTLER. Omaha manufactures more butter than does any other city in the world.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is a singular coincidence, because here we have an editorial on the margarine bill from the leading newspaper of the State, located in Omaha, and I understand it is a leading Republican newspaper, so it is not tainted with any southern or foreign isms. It has this to say about the margarine bill:

The bill passed by the House to repeal taxes that discriminate against oleomargarine was a good one.

The House turned away from the latest slick trick of the dairy bloc—to prohibit the shipment of colored margarine in interstate commerce—and voted a straight-out repealer. It provided that restaurants that serve margarine announce this fact and serve it in triangular pats—a reasonable enough provision.

The Senate should now pass the bill and end, after 70 years, an unjustified "domestic tariff" that has favored one wholesome food product at the expense of another.

Mr. President, I commend the Omaha World-Herald very highly for its ability to be objective in a matter of this kind, even though Omaha is the largest butter-producing city in the world.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD various other editorials. Most of them are short. They are, I believe, representative of every State whose Senators are opposing the removal of the restrictions on margarine. Some may say that is a rather strange coincidence, but the fact is that the newspapers throughout the country, feeling that it is their duty, and I think properly so, to represent the public opinion, are almost uniformly in favor of repeal of the restrictions on margarine. They are not unanimous in the sense that all of them are for removal of the restrictions, but they represent about the same proportion there was in the recent election in Ohio, the election in which a majority of almost half a million people—I think it was a better than 3-to-2 majority—voted to repeal the restrictions.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorials may be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Manchester (N. H.) Leader of May 26, 1949]

COLORED OLEO

Oleo for the table has been treated more kindly in the New Hampshire Legislature than in Congress. Here the colored oleo bill has been approved in both branches, and will presumably become law despite the amendment, tacked on by the senate, requiring that it be identified when served in public eating places.

In Washington, a pro-oleo bill was passed by the House, but now is apparently lost, perhaps by design, in the Senate. That is a poor way of doing the business. The oleo bill was vigorously fought in the national House, but won out. It should be given its fair chance of final enactment—at long, long last.

[From the New York World-Telegram of July 11, 1949]

MARGARINE REPEAL

In all the legislative schedules and "must" lists put out from Washington on the assumption Congress is going to adjourn July 31, we see nothing about the margarine-tax repeal bill.

Remember the bill that was going to permit the Nation's 31,000,000 housewives to buy yellow margarine without having to pay a heavy, unjust, and discriminatory Federal tax? It was passed by the House of Representatives by a 287-to-89 vote. It was favorably reported by the Senate Finance Committee. President Truman has advocated repeal of the margarine taxes and license fees. But where is the repealer?

Senate Majority Leader SCOTT LUCAS said 6 weeks ago he hoped to bring it up for Senate vote—there is good prospect it would be passed if it could get to the floor—but nothing has been done. Now the bill is competing for place with a host of other important measures in the preadjournment bottleneck.

But there is still time to get Senate action on the margarine bill if housewives will make themselves heard. Let your Senator know in no uncertain terms that the repealer must not die on the eve of success.

[From the Oregon City (Oreg.) Enterprise of June 30, 1949]

SENATE SHOULD ACT ON MARGARINE

The House in Congress has recently, again, passed a bill to repeal the law placing a Federal tax on margarine and prohibiting sale except with a penalty when colored, but there is no assurance the Senate will even take up the bill. Thus, the effort to place margarine where it should be in the economy is stymied.

The public, in these times of extraordinary, high prices and endless price supports for the agricultural economy, we believe is heartily intersted in having margarine, colored, at its lower cost, available without a penalty tax—a tax strictly to protect the butter industry. If butter could be kept down in price there might be some reason to let things stand, but butter was out of reach of millions and still is in generous quantities. It is economically cheaper to produce margarine and the public should not be denied it. Now, the public may have it of course by paying a penalty tax, that is strictly protective, but in most places the public has to color the product by a laborious and troublesome process. It should not be necessary.

Thus far the butter industry has not produced a convincing argument why the public should be penalized. Margarine is now made with vitamin values; it figures in the entire national economy through the work it provides, the shipping it brings and in many other ways. It is not a parasite on the economy.

The pressure is powerful and influential on the Senate. But the House withstood it not only now but in past years. Passage of the measure is in the public interest. The farmers are not as opposed to the measure as the butter manufacturers. Some way should be found to force the issue to the floor of the Senate, or the public clearly told why it is stymied.

[From the Salt Lake City Tribune of May 12, 1949]

CONSUMER TAKES HAND IN MARGARINE FIGHT

The Senate Finance Committee voted last week to approve the Poage bill (H. R. 2033), previously adopted by the House of Representatives, to free oleomargarine from the Federal restrictions it has been under for more than 60 years. The measure is expected to be brought out on the floor for debate within the next 2 weeks.

This is where we came in, for a similar bill was advanced this far last year, but never came out on the floor. The dairy interests received such a scare, however, that they retreated from their traditional demand that the tax be retained on margarine. Then they concentrated on a program of banning from interstate commerce all yellow margarine. The House Agriculture Committee, dominated by the dairy industry for 50 years, recommended the ban this year.

When the bill reached the House floor, however, it was passed with amendments repealing all taxes and requiring public eating places serving colored margarine to do so in triangular pats and to post notice to that effect on menus. It is very likely that what they hear from their constituents will have much to do with what the Senate does with the problem.

For more than 60 years the butter-margarine tussle was considered by most citizens as a struggle to keep a substitute from posing as a genuine product. That argument has largely been disproved. Scientific reports showing one product as good as the other and the boost that oleo received during the wartime scarcity of butter caused the public to realize it, too, had an interest in the fight.

Housewives discovered that they not only were paying high prices for butter, but were being taxed to supply subsidies to maintain high prices of butter. In addition, many States, including Utah, levy taxes on oleomargarine. And the housewife is still required to go through the messy job of coloring the spread. From statistics at hand, it appears that the margarine industry is not suffering. It is the housewife who is the victim, the abused one, in this three-way ruckus.

Most consumers who can afford it very likely will go on preferring butter and there are other paying markets for the dairy industry, notably fresh cream. But the housewife and the consumer are entitled to relief from unnecessary restrictions.

[From the Rutland (Vt.) Herald of July 16, 1949]

OLEO FORGOTTEN?

Tremendous pressure was placed on the Eighty-first Congress to bring about repeal of Federal tax restrictions on margarine. Consumer groups and others did all they could to bring about favorable action. Oleo tax repeal was one of the objectives of the Truman program, but it also had the support of many Republicans.

As of July 1, this year, Congress as a whole had taken no final action on the measure. It was passed by the House by a 287 to 89 vote. It was favorably reported by the Senate Finance Committee. But the Senate has yet to act—and the time is short.

Congress is rushing to adjournment; some say by the end of this month. This means a flood of last minute business—and a chance that oleo tax repeal may be sidetracked or forgotten.

Will history repeat itself? Through the years there have been repeated efforts to get Congress to remove restrictive controls on margarine. Until the Eightieth Congress these efforts were blocked by the powerful House Agriculture Committee which would not permit the bills to reach the floor.

The Eightieth Congress was an exception. The bill was forced out of committee and overwhelmingly approved by the House. It was stifled in the Senate.

While the Senate Finance Committee of the present Congress has reported the bill favorably, it must be approved by the Senate. But there's no word that the Senate will act on this measure in the pressure of last-minute business before adjournment.

Housewives have a special interest in seeing that the bill is acted upon. It was their protests against discriminatory Federal oleo taxes that did so much to bring the relief measure to its present position. But unless the bill becomes law, relief will not be forthcoming.

The bill would permit the Nation's 31,000,000 housewives to buy yellow margarine without having to pay a heavy, unjust, and discriminatory Federal tax. It would relieve them of the chore of coloring margarine themselves, so far as Federal regulations are concerned.

While similar restriction-removing laws in various States would also have to be enacted, Congress must start the move. And Congress has not done so.

[From the Seattle (Wash.) Argus of May 14, 1949]

UNABASHED DISCRIMINATION

Few more transparently discriminatory and patently senseless pieces of legislation persist as the law of the land today than the 63-year-old Federal laws covering the manufacture and sale of a legitimate food product which happens to be in competition with butter—oleomargarine. The restrictions on oleomargarine have been so obviously designed to serve the selfish interest of the relatively small group of producers in certain limited areas who contribute to the production of butter that one might almost expect the butter lobbyists to give up the fight against oleo simply from self-consciousness. After all, they've had things their own way for a good long time, considering that the rival product is the absolute equal of butter, in cleanliness and nutritional value, at least, if not in taste. The fear of the dairymen's organizations lest their product lose cut in free and open competition with the cheaper substitute bespeaks an uncertainty in the dairymen's own minds as to whether the merits of butter are really recognizable by the public.

Washington State is, of course, among those in which the dairy industry is most important; and thus it is explainable, if not entirely excusable, that among the many failures of the State's recent legislative session was the failure to abolish, or at least modify, our outmoded antimargarine restrictions. It no longer accords with our idea of serving the national welfare that the Federal Government and 18 States, including Washington, should perpetuate sectional and special interest protective devices at the expense of the myriad consumers of the country as a whole, especially when the devices set farmer against farmer, as these do.

For the second time in as many sessions, Congress seems close to acting decisively to end the antimargarine restrictions. The Poage bill (H. R. 2023) has passed the House by an overwhelming vote and is at this writing still to be acted on by the Senate. If the upper House does not let the legislation die in committee as it did in the preceding session, it will probably pass there also. The Poage measure would, if passed, abolish all the restrictive Federal taxes and license fees obstructing the free supplying of the market with margarine and would permit interstate shipment and sale of the product in precolored form. The bill does require that margarine is to be labeled for what it is and that it is to be distinguished from butter, if served in restaurants, by presentation in triangular shapes. The bill specifies that it shall not supersede existing State legislation covering the sale of colored oleo.

Merritt M. Nash, dairy farmer from Fall City, recently created something of a Nation-wide sensation by appearing before the Senate Finance Committee in behalf of a view that was explicitly disavowed, subsequently, by the lobbying organizations which presume to speak for dairy farmers. Said Farmer Nash: "I don't want to have to rely upon this crutch, this restrictive legislation, these unwarranted taxes, these color restrictions that we are imposing against a competitor, a legitimate competitor who is producing and distributing an American farm product.

"I don't need that crutch. * * * As a matter of fact, our present policy of restricting the other fellow has not increased our sales of butter, but our sales of butter have actually been going down." With a little more such disinterested encouragement, the Senate ought to be enabled to see its way clear to taking Government this little way out of a field of regulation where the results have been anything but favorable to either consumers or the competitive system. Personally, we think well enough of butter to believe it will maintain its popularity in competition with the lower-priced product.

[From the Oshkosh (Wis.) Daily Northwestern of May 19, 1949]

SHOULD REPEAL OLEO LAW

Although efforts were made to induce the Wisconsin Legislature to take off the punitive taxes levied by the State on the sale of oleomargarine and which adversely affect manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers, to date there continues to be a sufficient opposition among the lawmakers to prevent repealing the prohibitions that prevent ready-colored oleo being made available to consumers.

While many States allow yellow margarine to be sold, there is still a group of States that will not allow oleo colored yellow at the source of manufacture to enter State trade. Wisconsin is one of these latter and the pressure exerted by the dairy interests and dairy lobbyists apparently is too powerful to be overcome.

But eventually, we are convinced, yellow oleomargarine will win the day and Wisconsin will relax its discriminatory restrictions in the matter of taxes, license fees, and color, so that the vegetable product will be on its own as to proving its merit in free competition with butter.

The fight to throw aside the Wisconsin law against colored margarine will go on and should be pushed by those interested in giving oleo a chance to compete with butter on equal terms.

In Illinois a situation somewhat similar to that existing for a long term of years in Wisconsin has prevailed. But the oleo interests are battling on to get a law that will be fair to oleo and fair to butter. On this matter, the Chicago Daily News says:

"A bill to repeal existing State laws against colored margarine is before the house agricultural committee at Springfield. It offers adequate protection to the public against sale of margarine as butter, but it is being opposed on the phony old argument that butter has a vested interest in yellow coloration as applied to spreads.

"In the interest of the people of Illinois the legislature should pass this bill, removing the punitive restrictions on oleomargarine.

"Fortified with vitamins, as most commercial oleomargarine is, it is a healthful food, little different from butter and much cheaper. Many persons who cannot afford butter can get the food values necessary to a balanced diet from margarine. They should not be forced to pay an excessive tax. They should not be forced to color the margarine themselves."

In a statement presented some time ago by Senator J. W. FULBRIGHT, of Arkansas, of the Senate Finance Committee, the Senator, in discussing bills placed before the committee that deals with oleomargarine, said among other things:

"One measure is H. R. 2023, by Congressman POAGE, of Texas, which passed the House on April 1. This bill, similar to my own, S. 117, repeals all Federal taxes and excises on margarine. In addition it contains provisions intended to prevent fraud in the sale of margarine in public eating places.

"Another measure, in the nature of a substitute for H. R. 2023, sponsored by 26 Senators, proposes to confine the manufacture and sale of yellow margarine to intrastate commerce. For purposes of identification only, I shall refer to this measure as the Wiley bill.

"The Wiley bill, by contrast, contains no provisions whatever with regard to the identification of margarine in public eating places.

"Both the Poage bill and the Wiley bill would permit the sale of yellow margarine in exactly the same areas—the States which do not prohibit the sale of yellow margarine. The Poage bill would protect the consumer against deception; the Wiley bill gives him no protection and takes away protection he now has. If I were a dairyman and were concerned about competition from margarine, I would support the Poage bill in preference to the Wiley bill.

"Margarine, either yellow or white, is a perfectly good and wholesome product. It is made from domestic farm products and is manufactured in the United States. Housewives want to buy it already colored. They should have that privilege.

"It is time, and past time, to repeal these un-American Federal antimargarine laws and to pass on to other things."

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, a great deal has been said in the debate by various speakers opposing the removal of restrictions, about polls, this poll or that poll, conducted by some private poll organization, at the request, I am sure, of the butter organizations. But, after all, there is only one poll with which we in the Senate are thoroughly familiar, and on which we rely, and that is the elections in the States. That is how we get here. That is the only poll we can count on as being accurate and reflecting the real views of the people. In every one of such polls with which I am acquainted, and especially the latest one in Ohio, a not insignificant State, a very important dairy State—and there is no question about anyone conducting it for a special purpose or being influenced by any employer—we have the answer as to what the American people want, and I think those election polls can be accepted as fair examples of how the American people generally would vote on the question. The Ohio poll was not a sample poll. Nearly two and a half million people voted in that election on the issue of whether or not the restrictions upon colored margarine should be removed.

Mr. President, for the RECORD I desire to point out one or two other effects of the Wiley amendment if it shall be adopted. It is contended that it would be a very simple matter to establish margarine plants in the various States. I think those who make that contention are, in a way, trying to hold out the idea that a Senator who votes for the amendment is thereby bringing a plant into his State. Of course, that is a complete non sequitur. There are many other kinds of industries which it would be more profitable to bring into the various States. The same thing, for example, could be done in connection with the automobile industry. Certainly if each State should have a margarine plant there ought to be an automobile plant in every State. It is a larger industry than the oleomargarine industry. In dollars and cents value it is a greater industry than the oleomargarine industry. If the principle is sound, it ought not to be confined to margarine.

But here is what has happened in some of the States. It has been estimated—fairly accurately, I think—that a plant should have a potential market of approximately 5,000,000 people. Of course not all of them would buy oleomargarine. But that is about the number which I am informed normally would be required in order to supply a market for an average-sized plant.

I shall mention the States which at the present time do not have any plant in which yellow oleomargarine could be manufactured under existing law—and certainly the bill proposed by the committee does not specifically say that the States shall not have the right to determine whether yellow margarine—or any margarine, for that matter—shall be sold or made within their borders. Idaho has no plant. It is a State, if I recall correctly, with a population of approximately half a million. I think it is perfectly absurd to say that a margarine plant could economically be started there. Such a plant simply would not be economical. But if one were started, the margarine would have to be sold at a very high price. Of course, I assume it is one of the objectives of the proponents of the Wiley amendment that if oleomargarine were made at such a plant in Idaho, it would have to be sold at a price of $1 a pound, if it could be made and sold at all. But certainly it could not be sold from a plant there, with the market existing in the State, at anything like the present price.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. CORDON. Does the Senator think it would be difficult for a plant in Idaho to mix a little yellow pigment with the white oleomargarine already going into that State? That is all the amendment would require.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I made inquiry about that, and there are very grave doubts as to whether that would be a compliance with the proposed statute.

The next point—and it is a very important one—is that one of the things oleomargarine especially prides itself on is the purity of the product. We are told that it is not shipped in containers of this kind or that kind; we are told that in a modern oleomargarine plant, after the oil is pumped from the tank cars, from then on the process is a completely mechanical one which is not exposed to the air or to handling by persons who might contaminate the product with any kind of filth or dirt or anything of the sort.

But, Mr. President, if oleomargarine were shipped in tubs or other containers, it would run a very serious risk of being removed from the possibility of controlled quality; and I think that would be a very uneconomic process. But even if that problem were solved, such a process certainly would add substantially to the cost of oleomargarine.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. CORDON. I would say, first, that as between the shipment of yellow oleomargarine in interstate commerce, on the one hand, and permitting it to be shipped uncolored, and subsequently colored in the several States, on the other hand, there is to my mind very little difference.

However, it would appear to me also that if the housewife can color white oleomargarine yellow by a little squeezing of yellow coloring into it, certainly Lever Bros. and others might be able to do so with equal facility and at least in reasonably sanitary fashion.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not doubt that it could be accomplished.

The main point I was making about Idaho is that certainly the establishment of an independent plant for that purpose in Idaho would add considerably to the cost of the product in that area, and the market available would not support a complete plant there. If there were an answer to that situation, it would have to be along the line suggested by the Senator from Oregon.

But when we contemplate that kind of situation, what earthly good would the restriction proposed by this bill do the dairy people or to anyone, by forcing a plant in California—let us assume there is a plant in California—to make oleomargarine in white form in California, then ship it to another State, and then have the white oleomargarine colored yellow there? What would be the sense of doing that?

Knowing how very experienced the sponsors of the amendment are and how very successful they have been over the years in throttling oleomargarine, the suspicion developed in our minds that after the adoption of their amendment, they would insist that it prohibited the very thing the Senator from Oregon has suggested. I do not know. That point will have to be left for decision by the courts and by much better lawyers than I am.

But if it would be easy, as the Senator from Oregon suggests—and that may be possible—to have the plant in the State simply color the oleomargarine yellow, then there is no sense at all in putting this restriction into the law. It would be perfect nonsense. The only excuse which could be had for putting such a provision in the law is that it would prevent any easy coloring of white oleomargarine and any easy evasion of what the proponents of the amendment want.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield, but I wish to finish my remarks in a few minutes.

Mr. WILEY. The Senator from Arkansas is not so naive as all that. He knows that the purpose is to prevent the unfair practices which have been engaged in by the oleomargarine interests—practices deceiving people by the coloring of oleomargarine to look like butter.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yielded for questions, not for a speech.

Mr. WILEY. I asked whether the Senator was so naive as he claimed to be.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I was not claiming to be naive.

Mr. WILEY. Then the Senator's words belie his own arguments.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. All I say is that the dairy organization has been the most efficient of any I know of anywhere in the world in its activities in preventing or delaying a decision in the Senate on this matter. Certainly it has been most efficient in delaying the decision. I was paying a compliment to the Senator from Wisconsin and to Mr. Holman and to their associates, because I know of no one else who has been able to protect a relatively small and specialized interest, and to make all the rest of the country pay for it. I do not know of a similar case.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield for a question only, not for a speech.

Mr. WILEY. Does the Senator know that in 1948 the organization which is alleged to have spent $6,000,000 to get the people in the mood the Senator thinks they should be in had no organization at all?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I know that that is not the truth. I have heard the Senator make that statement on this floor time and time again.

Mr. WILEY. Then the Senator from Arkansas did not listen yesterday to the proof.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I know that the inspiration for most of the editorials, for example, that I just put into the RECORD did not come from any organization, but came from the debates in the House and in the Senate. I always maintain that one of the greatest mistakes, and the only one I can think of, of the butter organization was to precipitate this legislation and to oppose it as long as they did, and thereby give the oleomargarine producers what I would consider conservatively to be $10,000,000 worth of free advertising for which they did not have to pay. The editorials which I put into the RECORD were not paid for; I think the Senator from Wisconsin will agree with that statement. Some of them come from newspapers published in his own State. They were printed because of the public interest in these matters; and that was a very great mistake on the part of the butter interests. If anyone had had to purchase that kind of advertising it really would have run into money.

Mr. President, I wish to mention a few other States as illustrations. The State of Nevada had a population, at the last census, I believe, of approximately 150,000. It would be in the same situation. New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado, Oklahoma, Mississippi, Florida, Kentucky, Virginia, West Virginia, New Hampshire, Maine, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island are other States which, under the Wiley amendment, although they now permit the sale of yellow oleomargarine, would then be prohibited from importing it. That is the best comment I know how to make on the other phony theory that the substitute amendment is a States' rights amendment. Under that amendment, by affirmative Federal legislation, States which now are enjoying the privilege of using yellow oleomargarine would be prevented from using it or having it, unless someone—and we are not told who that would be—would build in those States plants for the production of oleomargarine.

I do not know whether the proponents of the amendment are proposing—they may be, of course—to have the Federal Government finance the building of such plants. I suppose that would be the next step, namely, to have the Government say, "We will build it with RFC money."

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield for a question.

Mr. WILEY. I wish to know if the same logic applies for filled milk.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. What logic?

Mr. WILEY. I refer to the Senator's statement that there should not be this prohibition against interstate shipments of colored oleo.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I think the Filled Milk Act was a complete violation of fundamental principles. I think it was erroneous. But that is water over the dam, by now.

Mr. WILEY. Then, the Senator disagrees with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The distinction between that case and this one is that in the filled milk case the advocates of that measure were able to get the Congress to make a positive finding that filled milk was deleterious to health and dangerous to public health and safety, and so forth. But the proponents of the amendment in the nature of a substitute have really backed up on that argument in this case, for no serious effort is now being made to say that oleomargarine is bad for health.

I think that law was absolutely wrong and that finding was wrong. But that is not an issue here.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield for a question. I should like to finish my remarks, if I may.

Mr. WILEY. The Senator from Arkansas said that 15 minutes ago.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I did not realize that the Senator from Wisconsin would interrupt me every 5 minutes. If he will calm down and permit me to conclude, I shall be through in 5 minutes' time.

Mr. WILEY. I did not interrupt the Senator from Arkansas until some time after he said he would be through in 15 minutes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I did not say I would be through in 15 minutes or at any other time if I was interrupted constantly.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield for a question only.

Mr. WILEY. Does the Senator say that the Supreme Court decision in the filled milk case was based on the proposition he has stated?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I said I thought the Filled Milk Act was a bad act, an act violating the fundamental principles of our free economy.

Mr. WILEY. Very well. The Senator avoids the answer.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator understands what I mean, does he not? I think it is a bad act, just as I think the Oleomargarine Act is a bad act, violating the fundamental principles of our free economy. That brings up a point, since the Senator referred to it. I have but a very short statement from the original case in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. I do not want to discuss it at length. It is also water over the dam, and we know how the court held, but I wish to quote briefly from the opinion of Mr. Justice Gordon. I want to make it clear that it was a dissent, but he states very well what I think is an appropriate comment on that act, and upon the Filled Milk Act, for that matter, although this was long before there was a Filled Milk Act. I wish to quote but one paragraph. He is referring to the original Oleomargarine Act, and to its application within the State of Pennsylvania. It is the first case, I believe, which tested the act in Pennsylvania, which prohibited this perfectly good food. Mr. Justice Gordon said:

> A glance at this act shows its purpose was to protect the dairyman at the expense of the consumer. Cannot a pure, wholesome butter be made from some other oil than that extracted from milk? Certainly it can. The chemist has discovered that it may as well be manufactured from the fat of the cow as from the fat of her milk.

Originally oleomargarine, I may say, was made from beef fat.

> This wonderful act of 1885 will allow us to eat it (oleomargarine) as a substitute for pork, or beef, or bread, or a substitute for anything but butter * * * it looks much more like a regulation passed for the welfare of the dairyman without regard to the welfare of the balance of the people. Class legislation, that political curse which the framers of the Constitution endeavored to prevent. * * * We * * * are establishing a precedent of the most dangerous character. * * * A doctrine which must necessarily be found on the ruins of the Bill of Rights. A chemist has discovered a process by which an important article of food can be manufactured more cheaply than by the old method. * * * Naturally we might suppose that this inventor would be hailed as the benefactor of his race since he has thereby added much to the happiness of the laboring class of people. But no, say our lawmakers; he is a malefactor, and shall not make or sell his product.

I turn now to a dissenting opinion written by Mr. Justice Field in the Supreme Court of the United States. I think it is useful for the RECORD, because there is much misapprehension about the character of the act. It has been on the books so long that everyone has assumed that, because it is old, it must have validity. But in this case that does not apply. Mr. Justice Field, in the United States Supreme Court, One Hundred and Twenty-seventh United States Reports, page 678, said:

> The right to pursue one's happiness is placed by the Declaration of Independence among the inalienable rights of man, with which all men are endowed, not by the grace of emperors or kings, or by the force of legislative or constitutional enactments, but by their Creator, and to secure them, not to grant them, governments are instituted among men. The right to procure healthy and nutritious food, by which life may be preserved and enjoyed, and to manufacture it, is among those inalienable rights, which in my judgment, no State can give and no State can take away except in punishment for crime. * * * A law does not necessarily fall under the class of police regulations because it is passed under the pretense of such regulation, as in this case by a false title.

I think that is exactly the correct situation with regard to the margarine legislation, which has been on the statute books so long.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent to insert as a part of my remarks certain material found in a document compiled by Anton J. Carlson, Ph. D., M. D., of the University of Chicago. First, there is the foreword to the revised edition, reading as follows:

FOREWORD TO THE REVISED EDITION

Requests for this compilation have been so numerous that in less than 2 years the relatively large number of copies printed has been exhausted. In the meantime, competent investigators in three university laboratories—University of Wisconsin, University of Illinois, University of Southern California—have verified the past record of all mammals as well as the prediction in my 1943 prefatory remarks: Normal growth, health, and life after weaning can be sustained without butterfat in the diet. In fact, the accelerated growth induced by an excess of the growth hormone can be sustained by diets containing fats other than butter. These significant findings are included—in abstracts—in this revised edition.

The facts at hand today eliminate all questions as to the nutritive value of vitamin A fortified margarine as compared to butter, except as to the question of flavor. But the restrictive laws—Federal and State—touching the production, distribution, and consumption of margarine are still on our statute books, and still render it more difficult for many people to secure adequate nutrition.

ANTON J. CARLSON.

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO, August 1945.

From the prefatory remarks on page 3, I desire to insert in the RECORD the following:

1. While milk is not an essential food, it ranks among the best foods for man. The common view that the main food value in milk is in the butterfat is an error. The other components—proteins, salts, vitamins—found in the skim milk are at least as important for human nutrition as is the milk fat—cream and butter.

Turning to page 5, there is an article entitled "Report on Butter Substitutes" from which I desire to quote the following:

From a nutritional viewpoint, when it is fortified with vitamin A in the required amount, oleomargarine is the equal of butter, containing the same amounts of protein, fat, carbohydrates, and calories per unit of weight. Moreover, since the minimum vitamin A content of enriched oleomargarine is fixed and the amount of this vitamin in butter may range from 500 to 20,000 units per pound, enriched oleomargarine is a more dependable source of vitamin A than is butter. Since it is a cheaper product than butter, fortified oleomargarine constitutes a good vehicle for the distribution of vitamin A and fats to low-income groups and should therefore be made available to them.

Under the standards set by the Food and Drug Administration, oleomargarine is as clean and sanitary a food as butter. The two products are likewise equal in digestibility. Their relative palatability is a matter of individual taste.

On page 7 there is an extract from a report on margarine by the Food and Nutrition Board of the National Research Council. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the extract was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

V. SUMMARY

1. Margarine fortified with vitamin A in accordance with Food and Drug regulations supplies an important amount of this nutrient as well as of much-needed fat. A previous recommendation of the Food and Nutrition Board that all margarine be fortified is reaffirmed. Because of the high proportion of margarine now fortified, mandatory requirement of fortification for all margarine for table use seems unnecessary at present, though it may become desirable if the situation changes in such a manner as to reduce importantly the proportion now fortified.

2. The present available scientific evidence indicates that when fortified margarine is used in place of butter as a source of fat in a mixed diet, no nutritional differences can be observed. Although important differences can be demonstrated between different fats in special experimental diets, these differences are unimportant when a customary mixed diet is used. The above statement can only be made in respect to fortified margarine and it should be emphasized that all margarine should be fortified.

3. It is obvious that the present excise and license taxes imposed by both Federal and State Governments on margarine interfere with the distribution and utilization of certain of our fat resources, but the implications of these taxes are so extensive and complex that no recommendation with respect to them can be made in this report.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. From the same publication, page 11, I offer for the RECORD the following:

EXTRACT FROM VI. GROWTH AND REPRODUCTION OVER 10 GENERATIONS ON SHERMAN DIET B WHERE BUTTERFAT WAS REPLACED BY A MARGARINE FAT

(By Harry J. Deuel, Jr., Lois F. Hallman, and Eli Movitt, Department of Biochemistry and Nutrition, University of Southern California School of Medicine)

SUMMARY

Experiments are reported on reproduction and growth of 10 generations in which the lineage is through the first litter and of 8 generations in which the lineage is through the second litter where the diets have been a modification of the Sherman B diet in which butterfat has been replaced by vitamin A-fortified margarine fat. The growth rate considerably exceeded that obtained with animals on our stock diet and progressively improved with the later generations. Somewhat faster growth was obtained with the first litter rats than with those in the second litter group. It is concluded that a vegetable fat such as that contained in a margarine can serve adequately in place of butterfat for growth and reproduction on a diet otherwise nutritionally satisfactory.

From the same document, page 12, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks the matter appearing on the lower half of the page.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXTRACT FROM FURTHER STUDIES ON THE COMPARATIVE VALUE OF BUTTERFAT, VEGETABLE OILS, AND OLEOMARGARINES

(By R. K. Boutwell, R. P. Geyer, C. A. Elvehjem, and E. B. Hart, Department of Biochemistry, College of Agriculture, University of Wisconsin)

"On the mixed carbohydrate diet, such as man ordinarily consumes, there was no conclusive evidence that oleomargarines were inferior to butterfat. In fact, some oleomargarines showed slight superiority and there was quite as much variation among oleomargarines as between the butterfat and the oleomargarines. If 6 weeks of growth of the rat at a rapid stage of its development can be used as the criterion of adequate nutrition, then certainly these oleomargarines compare favorably with butterfat. Whether this deduction is entirely sound can be answered only when growth to maturity and reproduction are studied experimentally."

SUMMARY

1. With lactose as the sole carbohydrate in the diet, rats showed superior growth when fed butterfat or lard as compared to corn oil, coconut oil, cottonseed oil, soybean oil, peanut oil, olive oil, and hydrogenated cottonseed oil.

2. With a mixture of carbohydrates composed of sucrose, starch, dextrose, dextrin, and lactose in the diet, the average growth response of the animals fed vegetable oils was equal to that of the animals fed butterfat and lard. The growth rate on this ration was more rapid than when all of the carbohydrate was present as lactose.

3. Properly fortified oleomargarine fats gave growth equal to butterfat over a period of 6 weeks when the above mixture of carbohydrates was incorporated in the rations.

4. Properly fortified oleomargarines did not give growth equal to butterfat when lactose was the sole carbohydrate in the diet. On such a regimen rats fed butterfat grew slightly better than rats fed oleomargarines of animal origin, but decidedly better than rats fed oleomargarines of vegetable origin.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. In the same document, at page 14, there is an article entitled "Oleomargarine," an editorial from the Journal of the American Medical Association. I ask unanimous consent to have two excerpts from the article printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Deuel and his associates found that growing rats could use either butterfat, various vegetable fats, or margarine with equal ease. The animals grew equally well, as shown by increase in weight and increase in bone length, whether their dietary fat consisted of butterfat or of margarine. In addition, Deuel made careful analyses of the rats maintained on diets containing the various fats and found that there was no difference in the protein, lipid, ash, or water content of the tissues of the animals. Then Elvehjem and his associates showed that margarines permitted satisfactory growth in rats when the carbohyrate of the diet was glucose, sucrose, starch, dextrine, or a mixture of them, whereas, when lactose was the sole carbohydrate of the diet, the rats grew better when butter or lard rather than oleomargarine was the fat used.

* * * * *

Vegetable fats such as those used in margarine, the evidence proved, can serve adequately in place of butterfat in regard to growth, reproduction, and lactation on a diet which would be otherwise nutritionally satisfactory.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I believe those are the only articles I wish to insert at this time. I merely want to add one further thought. I think much of the argument and debate on the pending subject has gone off on a sort of incidental matter. The real question of interest to the Senate, as it was to the House, is not the relative importance of the prosperity of a relatively few butter producers, even accepting the exaggerated claims of those who have stated how very important the industry is. The facts in the record will show that it is of minor importance compared to the over-all importance to the dairy industry itself. Even the proponents of the amendment I think stated recently that approximately 25 percent of the milk is used in butter.

Mr. WILEY. Twenty-nine percent.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. In many States, it is very small. The real matter of argument is the interest of the consumers of the country, and as I stated before, in every election where the question has been submitted to the people, they have voted overwhelmingly to get rid of the restrictions on a perfectly legitimate and healthful food product. The restrictions constitute a nuisance and are costly to them. It is costly to the poor man not to have this item of food available to him.

Much attention has been given to the tax of 10 cents a pound. In my opinion the tax on the retailers is much more effective to throttle the industry than the tax of 10 cents a pound, since less than 10 or 12 percent of the retailers will even handle yellow oleomargarine, because of the restrictions with regard to reporting, which are very onerous. It brings complaints similar to those we heard in the days of the OPA. They simply are not going to put up with the nuisance of keeping track of every pound of margarine and reporting it. That is one of the principal reasons why it has not been available. So when the proponents of the Wiley amendment so graciously give up their position with regard to taxes, and then in the next breath seek to restrict the shipment of oleomargarine, they do nothing at all to promote freedom in the handling of this food, or to make it available to the people who want it. I hope the Senate will not support the so-called Wiley amendment.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, I have on the desk an amendment which is proposed to be offered to the amendment in the nature of a substitute which is to be voted upon on next Tuesday. I would not take the time of the Chair and of my three or four colleagues now present on the floor were it not for the fact that I understand there will be no session of the Senate on Monday and this is my last opportunity to have the RECORD indicate even an elementary outline of what I take to be the cogent reasons why my amendment should be adopted.

My friend from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] has been dwelling upon the tax on oleomargarine as being a nuisance tax, a troublesome tax, an expensive tax to the manufacturer of oleomargarine. I wish to call attention to a real nuisance tax, to a tax which is really troublesome, a tax which is really expensive to collect, a tax which is really founded in injustice.

The purpose of the bill is to repeal the excise tax on oleomargarine. Germane to that purpose is the repeal of any excise tax. The sponsor of the proposed substitute has accepted and made a part of the substitute an amendment to repeal certain so-called wartime excise or nuisance taxes. For some reason which I do not know, the most onerous, the most unjust, of those several nuisance taxes has not been included in the list. I refer to the transportation tax on property. While that tax was enacted into law in 1942 and the balance of the nuisance or wartime taxes were enacted in the following year, 1943, the transportation tax on property is nonetheless a wartime tax, and more than any of the other taxes it fails in having any logical basis and it fails in answering any of the logical tests for equitable taxation. It is not, in fact, a tax on transportation. It is not a tax on persons. It is a tax on distance and nothing else.

This tax, Mr. President, will, for instance, result in discrimination which increases with the distance the taxpayer is located from the point of his market. I live on the Pacific coast and represent a State on the Pacific coast. Because the people in that State are 2,000 miles from manufacturing centers of the United States they must pay a tax on manufactured articles far in excess of that paid by those persons who are nearer the source of manufacture. There is no way for them to avoid it. It is not a tax based upon the value of the article there or eleswhere; it is a tax on distance. Not only are they compelled to pay the additional tax on the property which comes to them, but, by virtue of the competitive factors involved, they are compelled to absorb a like transportation tax on what they send to the market. When their products, chiefly agricultural products, including, of course, lumber, come into highly competitive markets, the competitive factor alone requires an absorption by the seller of the additional transportation cost in order that there may be a competitive price. That fact is set out most graphically in a letter which I have recently received from one of the lumber operators in the Pacific Northwest. I shall presently ask for the inclusion of the entire letter in the RECORD, but at the moment I desire to read only some brief excerpts in the interest of saving time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the entire letter may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CORDON. This lumber operator says:

The west coast lumber industry has the following problem before it pertaining to the Atlantic coast lumber market, which can become most serious to the entire industry at any time.

For the first 10 months of 1949 there has been shipped to the Atlantic coast from the west coast approximately 993,000,000 feet of lumber or about 10 percent of our west coast fir production. Of this amount approximately 816,000,000 feet came from Oregon and Washington and approximately 177,000,000 feet from British Columbia. However, during the last few months the British Columbia mills have greatly increased their shipments to the Atlantic coast to the extent that—we are informed—they have chartered approximately 18 ships that will move from British Columbia to the east coast during December, January, and February.

The reason for this increase is on account of the decline in their export lumber markets due, no doubt, to dollar scarcity over the world, but principally, in our opinion, due to the tremendous advantage they have in our domestic Atlantic coast market compared with American mills. This comes about in this way. American lumber must move on American ships, the present rate being $26.50 plus 3-percent tax. British Columbia lumber can and does move on foreign ships, which at present prevailing charter rates reflect approximately $7 to $9.50 per thousand lower freight than American freight. This, together with the 10-percent Canadian dollar devaluation, enables them to deliver lumber to the east coast ports at $9 to $11 per thousand cheaper than we.

Mr. President, the letter goes on to picture graphically the discrimination against the western mills. It suggests certain types of relief. I have referred the letter to the Tariff Commission for its comment. I think I know what the comment will be. I call attention to it only because here is exemplified the inequity of the transportation tax on property. We ourselves by that tax are increasing the subsidy of the Canadian mills. We are ourselves increasing the discrimination against our own people in the Pacific Northwest. It is not a question of a few large owners of vast amounts of timber and great sawmill properties. There are thousands of small operators, and many of them have been compelled to close their business because of this competitive situation. I do not know that the removal of the 3-percent tax would answer all their problems, but it would be at least a partial answer and would be in the interest of common equity and honesty.

Mr. President, I ask that the entire letter be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

C. D. JOHNSON LUMBER CORP.,
Portland, Oreg., December 15, 1949.

The Honorable Senator GUY CORDON,
Imperial Hotel, Portland, Oreg.

DEAR SENATOR: The west coast lumber industry has the following problem before it pertaining to the Atlantic coast lumber market, which can become most serious to the entire industry at any time. For the first 10 months of 1949 there has been shipped to the Atlantic coast from the west coast approximately 993,000,000 feet of lumber, or about 10 percent of our west coast fir production. Of this amount approximately 816,000,000 feet came from Oregon and Washington and approximately 177,000,000 feet from British Columbia. However, during the last few months the British Columbia mills have greatly increased their shipments to the Atlantic coast to the extent that (we are informed) they have chartered approximately 18 ships that will move from British Columbia to the east coast during December, January, and February.

The reasen for this increase is on account of their decline in their export lumber markets due, no doubt, to dollar scarcity over the world, but principally, in our opinion, due to the tremendous advantage they have in our domestic Atlantic coast market compared with American mills. This comes about this way. American lumber must move on American ships, the present rate being $26.50 plus 3 percent tax. British Columbia lumber can and does move on foreign ships which at present prevailing charter rates reflect approximately $7 to $9.50 per thousand lower freight than American freight. This together with the 10-percent Canadian dollar devaluation enables them to deliver lumber to the east coast ports at $9 to $11 per thousand cheaper than we. This is aside from any lower wage rates and stumpage costs they have in manufacturing lumber compared with us which is substantial and estimated to be at least $5 per thousand feet. The net result of the transportation and devaluation factors alone mean that they can sell lumber at say $52 American f. a. s. mill and realize approximately $62, or conversely they can lower their price to say $42 and still realize approximately $52 American. In other words they have approximately $10 per thousand leeway to put us out of the Atlantic-coast market and still be on a profitable basis to them and probably an unprofitable basis to west-coast lumber.

It has occurred to us that probably under the present set-up in Washington nothing can be done about the devaluation advantage, probably nothing can be done about their wage and stumpage advantage, nor could any import duty be imposed to equalize the difference in cost. However, it has occurred to us that it might be possible to equalize some of these large differences by imposing an excise tax on the difference between their transportation to the east coast compared with ours. In other words, if their rates were $6 to $8 less than ours, then a $6 to $8 excise tax would be imposed on this shipment as the ship arrives at east-coast ports. This would be a flexible tax, moving up or down with the prevailing charter rates, and if at such times there was no difference in their transportation rates compared with ours, no tax would be imposed.

If such a suggestion as this were possible and practical, it would appear to be a reasonable solution under our present politics and foreign policy. First, it would not involve a duty on Canadian lumber and involve in any way our reciprocal trade agreements with all their ramifications. Secondly, it would not impose any penalty or discrimination on Canadian lumber as they would still be able to compete on the Atlantic coast under the same transportation costs that American lumber would have. Thirdly, it eliminates discussion of a controversial issue of possibly subsidizing American shipping to compete with foreign shipping to our own domestic markets. Fourth, it would bring revenue to the Federal Government without discriminating against the Canadian mills by merely pocketing the difference between foreign shipping and American shipping to our own market and putting the American mills on the same basis, insofar as transportation is concerned, as Canadian mills to our own domestic market. Fifth, this should not be an unpopular request as it would have the full support of the lumber industry and its labor, and the full support of the American shipping interest and its maritime labor, and should not involve our foreign policy and reciprocal trade agreements as presently set up.

This approximate $10 advantage the British Columbia mills have can at any time put the west coast lumber industry almost totally out of this important Atlantic coast market, and along with it American intercoastal shipping and maritime labor.

We shall be glad to get your ideas on this subject and suggestions of what you think might be done or might not be done to meet this problem.

With best regards, we are,
Sincerely yours,

E. E. JOHNSON,
Vice President.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, the transportation tax on property affects everyone. It is particularly iniquitous with reference to all agriculture and especially to the wheat farmer, the corn farmer, the cotton farmer, and those who raise crops in bulk which must have a market off the farm. I hope that when consideration is given to the amendment which has been accepted by the sponsor of the substitute he may feel that he can, under the parliamentary situation, accept this additional amendment. If that cannot be done, I desire to say now for the RECORD that I shall present the amendment at the appropriate time for action by the Senate on Tuesday. Equity in this country pleads for its adoption.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S FOREIGN TRADE PROGRAM

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I shall not delay the Senate long, as the hour is late. I am sure we all wish to return to domestic bliss, and home will look more attractive as my speech goes on. I had planned to speak briefly on this subject, which is utterly unrelated to any of the matters which have been discussed here today, but in view of the situation I feel that I should get my statement in the RECORD.

There were approximately 1,000,000 more men out of work in December than in November. That is a matter of grave concern. It brings our total unemployed in the United States now close to 4,000,000. What the Senator from Oregon has said is an indication of one factor. In my home town in Maine, a woolen mill which has operated for 100 years is this month in process of liquidation as a result of the textile problem which we are facing in New England.

I have followed with keen interest the effect upon our imports and exports of the devaluation of the British currency in September, and of the acceptance of the Annecy agreements shortly thereafter, which were negotiated at Annecy, France, and were promulgated by our State Department under the reciprocal trade agreements shortly after the devaluation. I have always been puzzled as to how the Annecy agreements could be justified after devaluation if they were just before. That, however, is only an aggravation of the problem.

Following the report of the imports and exports for October and November, the 2 months following devaluation, the trend was extremely interesting.

The jobs of more than 1,000,000 American workers will be sacrificed to the administration's foreign trade program this year if current trends of export and import trade continue. Well over 3,500,000 men, women, and children will lose their meal tickets and 1,150,000 workers will find their jobs eliminated if exports continue to decline at the October and November 1949 rate while cheap labor imports of competitive products continue to increase at the October-November rate.

Imports increased $33,400,000 in October over September, and they increased another $33,600,000 in November over October, a total increase of $67,000,000 in 2 months and a continuation of this geometrical stepping up appears to be in the offing. If it should continue for even 1 year our imports would increase by about $100,000,000 in 3 months, $200,000,000 in 6 months, and the increase in the twelfth month would be $400,000,000 over that of September 1949.

The accumulation of each month's increase would mean that in the 12-month period following September 1949 we will bring into this country additional imports amounting to $2,600,000,000.

Now, on the other hand, exports decreased $53,100,000 in October from the September level, and they decreased another $13,600,000 in November, a total decline of $66,700,000 in the 2 months. The gradual strangulation of American exports in many foreign markets indicates that this trend will also continue—and, projecting them for 1 year, we find just the reverse of the imports—a loss valued at over $2,500,000,000, every cent of which can be definitely identified as a loss of business for the domestic producer and a loss of jobs to the workers.

It was apparently contemplated if we could increase our imports we would also increase our exports. That has not proved to be the case to date.

The estimated national product for 1949 — Department of Commerce — is $259,000,000,000, and the average employment, including the armed forces, has been officially estimated at around 59,500,000. Dividing the number of employees into the value of the product we find that the average workman in 1949 produced goods valued at $4,353. On that official basis is would take, for the production of $5,000,000,000 worth of goods, 1,150,000 men working for one full year.

I wish to offer for insertion in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks an article from the Wall Street Journal of January 11, 1950, entitled "Import Impact—Cheaper Foreign Goods Begin To Cut a Swath in Domestic Markets—They Hit United States Chinaware, Gloves, Sewing Machines, and Simulated Pearls—Protests Reach Washington."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I shall read very briefly from the article, showing that it details the effect of imports on small American manufacturers who are being forced to curtail profits because of an inflow of cheap-labor products manufactured abroad. I quote briefly from the article:

> Makers of a significant scattering of items—from simulated pearls to sewing machines to chinaware—are getting those import jitters once again.
> Reason for the latest reoccurrence of a well-known prewar ailment: Goods from Japan and Europe—

It should be clear in the RECORD that Japan and Germany are still in the most-favored-nation class, so that imports from those countries take the benefit of whatever reduction of duties may be put into effect at any time—

The administration is sacrificing small American handicraft industries to foreign imports on the grounds that dollar earnings by foreign competitors will encourage American exports of automobiles and other mass-production items.

The fact is that while imports have risen to threaten small industries in America, exports have fallen off.

The increase in imports of competitive goods and the decrease in exports of all kinds of goods inevitably increases unemployment in the United States.

I have pointed out these possibilities as a firm reminder to those who clamor for increased use of foreign goods that the result of artificial stimulation of imports can very well mean extensive unemployment in this country. Some of our diplomats are either unaware of this, or they are ignoring it for what seems to them more important reasons.

One wonders how long unemployed Americans or their more fortunate but sympathetic fellows will desire to support the propaganda broadsides of the State Department to "buy foreign" and put American workmen out of jobs. In the eyes of this administration to "buy American" is almost treason.

I hold in my hands two recent Government publications designed to show foreign industries how to move into the American market.

One brochure of 130 pages is issued under the joint auspices of the ECA and the Department of Commerce. The other is issued by the State Department. Both fail to disclose the sacrifice of some American industries that is involved and of thousands of American workers for the sake of what is alleged to be the larger whole.

There are other ways of balancing our international exchange budget that need not involve the loss of nearly so many jobs.

I trust that as time goes on the impact of these imports upon our domestic situation and the growing loss of exports that seems to be its concomitant will bring about such a situation that the administration will seriously reconsider its current trade policies, and will not in the case of our tariff rates carry the reductions which are now authorized under existing law some 20 to 30 percent further. Our tariff rates are now at the all-time low in the history of our country, averaging 6 percent on all our imports, and practically 12 percent on all our dutiable imports. I hope the administration will not undertake to bring about further reductions, as announced by the State Department as now being contemplated, but that they will reconsider, as they may under the escape clause, the existing cuts which are having such a devastating effect upon current employment in many sections of the country, and particularly in New England.

IMPORT IMPACT—CHEAPER FOREIGN GOODS BEGIN TO CUT A SWATH IN DOMESTIC MARKETS—THEY HIT UNITED STATES CHINAWARE, GLOVES, SEWING MACHINES, AND SIMULATED PEARLS—PROTESTS REACH WASHINGTON

(By Edward Bejan)

Makers of a significant scattering of items—from simulated pearls to sewing machines to chinaware—are getting those "import jitters" once again.

Reason for the latest reoccurrence of a well-known prewar ailment: Goods from Japan and Europe are entering the United States market in increasing volume and at prices domestic producers find hard to meet. These foreign wares constitute only a trickle, of course, compared with the enormous cutpouring of American factories, but they are already beginning to have an impact on certain industries.

Take the Gelmart Knitting Mills, Inc., of Yonkers, N. Y. This firm has cut back its production of wool and cotton gloves 80 percent from a year ago. Gelmart still considers itself lucky, however, because it was able to get a supply of nylon for glove making. President Arthur Goldsmith explains the switch to the synthetic fabric: "Japan sells cotton string gloves to American jobbers at $5 for a dozen pairs. We have to get $9.75 a dozen, since our labor costs alone amount to $5."

Other glove makers in the same Hudson River town are not so lucky. Reports the Hega Knitting Mills: "We're operating at 25 percent of capacity and our break-even point is 60 percent, and the outlook is worse. We may be forced to close down next year." The Sternwild Knitting Mills, Inc., which usually halted regular output for 30 days around this time of the year for sample making, says it will be slower resuming operations this year; the company's output before the current shut-down was running 25 to 30 percent below a year ago. The York Glove Mills, also in Yonkers, looks for a 50-percent drop in its 1950 volume.

THEY WERE DIFFERENT

American producers in the postwar era have tended to regard most imported products as different from home-made goods rather than as a competitive threat. They have in mind such things as Scotch whisky, Irish linen, and Belgian lace. Now, however, many a manufacturer sees foreign wares directly threatening his markets.

Up and down New York's Worth Street, textile hub of the country, merchants are keeping a nervous eye on Japanese cotton goods quotations. Dealers report some Nipponese-made "gray" textiles have already entered the United States at prices below those for corresponding American wares. One result: Anglo-American textile men are planning to send an exploratory group to Japan to size up the situation.

Wool-fabric makers are alarmed at the influx—at lower than domestic prices—of English and Italian merchandise. Better quality imported goods, according to trade reports, are landing duty-paid at $1.50 to $2 a yard below current New York quotations.

Dinnerware manufacturers are more than alarmed: They cite Japanese and German imports as the main factor behind an estimated 25-percent dip in their sales last year below 1948. The Jackson Vitrified China Co., which claims to produce the least expensive chinaware set in the United States, says it is unable to meet Japanese prices.

Reports Philip Distillator, Jackson's president: "A few months ago, Japanese producers trimmed the wholesale price of a typical 12-piece set from about $42 to $30. Our set was $50 then. We were forced to come down to $40, but we can't go any lower."

SEWING-MACHINE HEADS FROM JAPAN

Bulking large in the sewing-machine field are imports of Japanese heads—machines not yet installed in cabinets or equipped with electric motors. A spokesman for big Singer Manufacturing Co. estimates these are coming in by the thousands. One importer reports his sales of heads rose from about $10,000 in 1948 to well over $100,000 last year.

Several American manufacturers and distributors specialize in putting the Nipponese machines in cabinets and outfitting them with motors. Some do their own importing under exclusive contracts with Japanese plants. One of these, Bega Bros. Products Corp., says its sales of the imported machines have increased 200 percent over 1948. Morse Sewing Machine, which imports a unit to retail at $139, claims its current volume is running 25 percent over 1948 and "we sell everything we bring over."

A bargain hunter can pick up an inexpensive console-type Japanese-make machine today for around $95. In contrast, the cheapest Singer console model retails for $164.50.

Another major Japanese import—simulated glass-base pearls—is gaining a foothold in American markets. To meet the wholesale price of the imported beads—$1.50 a dozen necklaces in New York—United States makers have been forced to use plastic-base pearls. The catch is that domestic consumers prefer the glass-base pearls which are heavier and fit more snugly.

Some simulated pearl manufacturers, finding it difficult to meet this Japanese competition, are solving the problem by becoming importers. Ditchik Bros., for example, has trimmed its output some 50 percent and is importing merchandise to offset that cutback. Spencer Novelty Manufacturing Co. is now importing 25 percent of the wares it is selling.

BULB COMPETITION

"Killing" is the term used by flower bulb growers to describe competition from Holland. Says Arend Schravendeel of Schravendeel & Segers Sons, Inc.: "We should get $20 a thousand for gladiola bulbs but we have to sell at $9 to $10 to meet the Dutch price. Back in 1947, gladiola bulbs were bringing $45 to $50 a thousand." Mr. Schravendeel has watched his production at Palmyra, N. Y., shrink from 52 acres in 1948 to 15 acres today "and I don't know whether I'm going to be able to keep that much going."

Charges of foreign "dumping" are beginning to reach the Federal Tariff Commission in Washington. Among them: The Northwest Bulb Growers Association says the Dutch sometimes sell narcissus bulbs at a loss in this country to get badly needed dollars. The S. S. White Dental Manufacturing Co., Ransom & Randolph Co., and Lee S. Smith & Son Manufacturing Co. have lodged complaints that German dental burs offered to American buyers at $2.88 a gross are being sold to Brazilians for $3.60. American-made dental burs range from $5.82 to $7.73 a gross.

United States customs regulations prescribe a special duty for goods that are dumped, the penalty consists of the difference between the purchase price and the foreign market value on the date of purchase or the difference between the purchase price and the cost of production.

Several protesting groups are seeking import curbs and higher duties. These include northwestern nut growers, who ask a 50-percent hike in duties, and the Association of Knitted Glove and Mitten Manufacturers, which is pressing for a quota on shipments to this country.

Their chances of getting such restrictions, manufacturers agree, are slim. ECA and other Government officials have long been urging increased imports to close the trade gap; United States overseas purchases still lag far behind shipments abroad.

Lower labor costs are a big factor in foreign manufacturers' successful invasion of American markets. One United States maker of knitted berets, for instance, declares his labor costs are five to eight times those prevailing in France and Czechoslovakia. A manufacturer of wool fabrics puts his labor bill at triple the English level and five times the Italian rate.

Ability of overseas producers to make speedier delivery than before is also aiding the sale of foreign goods. And finally, say importers, merchandise produced abroad has improved considerably in quality during the past year. Harold Wilson, president of the British Board of Trade, mentions that he didn't hear a single complaint about the quality of English wares during a recent trip to United States cities.

RECESS TO TUESDAY

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I move that the Senate now stand in recess until 11 o'clock a. m. on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until Tuesday, January 17, 1950, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 13 (legislative day of January 4), 1950:

UNITED STATES ADVISORY COMMISSION ON INFORMATION

The following-named persons to be members of the United States Advisory Commission on Information for terms of 3 years expiring January 27, 1953, and until their successors have been appointed and qualified (reappointments):

Mark A. May, of Connecticut.
Justin Miller, of California.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

Charles S. Reed 2d, of Ohio, now a Foreign Service officer of class 2 and a secretary in the diplomatic service, to be also a consul general of the United States of America.

Edmund A. Gullion, of Kentucky, now a Foreign Service officer of class 3 and a secretary in the diplomatic service, to be also a consul general of the United States of America.

The following-named persons, now Foreign Service officers of class 5 and secretaries in the diplomatic service, to be also consuls of the United States of America:

Weldon Litsey, of Wyoming.
Leslie Albion Squires, of California.
Richard A. Poole, of New Jersey.
Randolph Roberts, of Virginia.

The following-named Foreign Service staff officers to be consuls of the United States of America:

Antonio Certosimo, of New York.
Harold E. Hall, of Utah.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JANUARY 16, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty! Heaven and earth are full of Thy goodness; glory be to Thy holy name. We praise Thee that Thy love and mercy are over all, and blessed for evermore.

In the spirit of gratitude we come to Thee, with faith and confidence in those great virtues that make for righteousness in man and stability in government. O make us strong with Thy strength, make us wise with Thy wisdom, and make us better with the sense of Thy goodness. As instruments in Thy hands, help us to be diligent in all good works, and thus bring honor to our country and our God. We pray in the Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, January 12, 1950, was read and approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Hawks, one of his secretaries.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on Calendar Wednesday of this week be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McCORMACK (at the request of Mr. PRIEST) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

Mr. MANSFIELD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address by Vice President ALBEN W. BARKLEY at a testimonial dinner for William L. Boyle at Kansas City, Mo., on September 29, 1949.

Mr. DOYLE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and to include therein some appropriate printed matter.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. WICKERSHAM asked and was given permission to address the House for 15 minutes today following the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and the conclusion of special orders heretofore granted.

COTTON-ACREAGE ALLOTMENTS

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Speaker, it is important that we give careful consideration to remedying the cotton-acreage allotments.

At the time the bill was being considered, prior to its passage, I appeared before the House Agricultural Committee and offered several amendments which would have relieved the inequities which we now face.

Our State and county PMA officials and committeemen are not to blame for our present predicament.

Later, I offered several amendments on the floor of the House during the debate on the measure, and warned the membership that the acceptance of my amendments was imperative. However, the amendments were not accepted.

Last week I appeared before the House Agricultural Committee and urged the adoption of certain other amendments which I submitted. The adoption of the Cooley amendment will not be sufficient to remedy the inequities. We must make a provision that an individual farmer be allowed to plant at least 70 percent of the average acreage planted to cotton or war crops, combined, in the years 1941 to 1948, inclusive, or at least 50 percent of any of those years, including 1949, whichever is the greater acreage. It will also be necessary that we provide for reallocation of acreage within the county and State in order that those who do not desire to plant may release the unused or frozen acreage to those who need it. This would be done through the county committees. One-half of the acreage should be reallocated by the county committee, and the remainder by the State PMA.

Many farmers, including thousands of veterans, have purchased farms in 1948 and 1949 with the expressed intention of raising cotton, and should be considered, and the minimum should be adopted which would provide a specified separate allotment for irrigated areas like the Lugert-Altus, Okla., area, which would not take away any of the acreage from dry-land farmers.

There should be a provision adopted which would grant an appeal from BAE acreage figures.

We should also adopt an amendment which would allow any cotton farmer to vote, not just those who raised cotton in 1948.

We should likewise adopt my amendment which would provide for the swapping of wheat and cotton acreage allotments at the county and State levels, just so the acreage did not exceed our county and State allotments.

The act should have been based on the historical basis instead of tillable-acreage basis.

An amendment should be adopted that would insure that each family has sufficient cotton acreage to provide a living. In other words, each family should have enough acreage to provide an economic family operating unit.

Twenty years ago Oklahoma was at one time the largest cotton-producing State, and was second in acreage in the Nation. We had four times as much cotton acreage as is now allotted. Oklahoma farmers have been taught the advantages of diversifying, and as a result have diverted considerable cotton acreage to wheat and other commodities in the last few years, due to labor conditions, diversification, price, and climatic conditions, and because farmers were urged to diversify to war crops in 1945, 1946, and 1947, and because of the fact that we farm our land in 1-, 2-, and 3-year cycles, alternating between wheat, cotton, grain sorghums, and other crops.

I desire to read a letter from the PMA executive officer, together with tabulations relating to the various amendments:

STILLWATER, OKLA., January 9, 1950.

Hon. VICTOR WICKERSHAM,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN WICKERSHAM: As you requested in our telephone conversation today, we are sending a tabulation by counties showing the estimated acreage which would be required "to provide each farm with (1) 70 percent of the 1946–48 average actual cotton acreage, (2) 50 percent of the highest planted cotton acreage, including war crop credit for 1946, 1947, or 1948, (3) higher of 70 percent or 50 percent as outlined above." These estimates were made by the county committees on the basis of a 10-percent sample of farms.

Because of the time allowed and the lack of any sound basis, we are unable to give you any estimate by counties of the additional acreage which would be required had the 70-percent provision included the war crop credit. However, we doubt whether the inclusion of this acreage would make any substantial difference in the total acreage required, probably 8,000 or 10,000 acres for the State.

We have also enclosed a tabulation showing the comparison between the 1942 and 1950 cotton allotment. You will notice that Osage and Pawnee Counties are the only counties in which the 1950 allotment is equal to the 1942 allotment.

In connection with the release and reapportionment provision which we discussed in our conversation, the county committee estimated that approximately 70,000 acres would be released for reapportionment if a provision similar to that contained in past programs was provided by law. The State committee is of the opinion that this is probably too conservative.

The State committee is very anxious that a release and reapportionment provision be made immediately for use in connection with the 1950 program. This would provide the county committees with a means of alleviating many of the hardship cases and adjusting some of the inequities.

I hope that this information will be helpful to you and that you will call on us for any additional information that you require.

Very truly yours,

H. P. MOFFITT,
Executive Officer.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include two editorials.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. EVINS]?

There was no objection.

[Mr. EVINS addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

[Mr. TACKETT addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GREEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a letter.

Mr. RAMSAY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD covering a survey and report of the Port Control Division of the Bureau of Customs.

Mr. KEOGH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include three letters.

Mr. KEE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances, and in each to include a brief newspaper article.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and attach extraneous matter.

COTTON ACREAGE ALLOTMENTS

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I recall, if I am not mistaken, when the cotton acreage allotment legislation was before us in August we had only 1 hour of general debate. I furthermore recall that it was difficult to get time to speak on the amendment to it offered in October 1949. I sincerely trust that the Committee on Agriculture, when the resolution is brought to this floor, will see that ample time for discussion of these important cotton acreage allotment proposals is available.

I have a letter from a veteran in Van Zandt County in which he says:

I have a wife and four children. I was raised on a farm. After spending 2 years overseas in the Navy during the war I came home to start farming for myself. I've done very well up until now. I bought a place this last November through the Farmers Home Administration. But I am going to lose it unless you help me. The farm consists of 161 acres and sold for $9,900. The land has been laying out for several years, and therefore I cannot get either a cotton or peanut allotment. It is very good cotton land and I am a cotton farmer. I worked part of the land last year and made about one-half bale of cotton to the acre. Could you tell me what to do? If I lose it, the Government will never buy me another farm. I am sure to lose it unless you can help.

It is obvious the Government in one instance undertakes to put this veteran in a secure position to farm and then through the inadequacy of the acreage given him to farm takes from him the opportunity to pay for the very farm it helped him to buy.

I enclose his full letter:

CANTON, TEX., January 12, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: I have a wife and four children. I was raised on a farm. After spending 2 years overseas in the Navy during the war I came home to start farming for myself. I've done very well up until now. I bought a place this last November through the Farmers Home Administration, but I am going to lose it unless you help me. The farm consists of 161 acres and sold for $9,900. The land has been laying out for several years and therefore I cannot get either a cotton or peanut allotment. It is very good cotton land and I am a cotton farmer. I worked part of the land last year and made about one-half bale of cotton to the acre. Could you tell me what to do? If I lose it, the Government will never buy me another farm. I am sure to lose it unless you can help.

Yours truly,

JOHN T. ATHERTON.

It is shown that one county, for example, has 500 families that will not be able to farm because of the present cotton-acreage legislation that has been written. Unless the so-called Cooley resolution is much different from what I have heard it is, I think the facts will show that this country will get only about an additional 1,500 acres. It is obvious that 1,500 acres will not take care of 500 families. I certainly hope the bill can be amended, as the people down there are hoping it will be amended, in order that genuine, family-sized, cotton farmers can remain on the farm, because getting a job today is not the easiest undertaking in the world.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECKWORTH. I yield.

Mr. COX. Maladministration of this law has put hundreds of farmers on the road looking for jobs in my State.

Mr. BECKWORTH. There is more to it than maladministration.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I include some letters I have received:

TYLER, TEX., January 10, 1950.

Hon. Mr. BECKWORTH:

I am wondering tonight as I read through your documents from the first session of the Congress and wondering what will become of the little farmer. I have a 135-acre farm and children farming that land and five of them have families on the farm. And the allotment on the farm to plant in cotton is 5 1/10 acres for the five crops. If there can be any remedy in our favor I do favor more acres. I will appreciate your efforts for the same. Please let me hear from you at an early date. Thanking you for past favors.

Respectfully,

CHARLES MAYFIELD.

P. S.—The war had my boys and now they are back on the farms to try and make a living. Please tell me what can be done about this matter.

CARTHAGE, TEX., January 11, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you about this cotton allotment. I don't know how you all think the people are going to live down here. We have just been planting enough to get by, and now with this cut we can't get by. It has ruined the people in this part of the country. There are just lots of us can't make enough to pay back what it would take to make a crop, and there will be lots of people that can't borrow any money.

There are just lots of places that are just allowed 5 or 6 acres. Take me, I have farmed all of my life. Take back during the war, I stayed on the farm renting the other fellow's land and now I have bought 100 acres 3 years ago and I have a little over 40 acres in cropland. And I have not found out how much cotton I can plant yet, but they told me it would be about 5 or 6 acres, and a man can't live on that amount of cotton much less pay for a place. There isn't anything right about it and I think it is high time to do something about it and I would be glad to hear from you and I want you to do something about it.

Well, I will close hoping to hear from you soon.

GRAND SALINE, TEX., January 10, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: I have two 100-acre farms near Edgewood in Van Zandt County. Each of these farms has about 90 acres tillable land, one of them being your grandfather's old home place south of Edgewood and the other north of Edgewood.

It has been some 5 years since either of these farms had any cotton on it and I find it almost impossible to rent either this year unless I am allowed to have cotton planted. Will you do what you can to assist me in getting cotton acreage allotment on each farm for the current year? If I am not allowed an allotment, and have cotton planted regardless, please advise me what penalty if any for such action and would I be allowed to market the cotton.

Wishing you the best of success, I am,

Yours very truly,

W. L. PETTIGREW.

Third District, Texas,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This will answer your letter of December 23, 1949, regarding proposed legislation to relieve the deplorable situation that cotton growers in Panola County, Tex., find themselves. No doubt the same conditions exist in most of east Texas, parts of Arkansas, Oklahoma, Louisiana, Alabama, Georgia, and the northern part of Mississippi. In referring to these areas, I have in mind sections of the country where poorer land and smaller farms are located. They were populated with people, both colored and white, with limited education, small incomes, large families, and low credit ratings. Then the war came and age groups affected by selective service could not be deferred because of insufficient units on these small farms. For economical and patriotic reasons those rejected for military service went to nearby shipyards, defense plants, and other employment necessary to the war effort and even to large farms in other sections of the country where farming is carried out on a mass-production scale. Rising prices made it necessary that they earn more money than could be expected from a small farm.

After the war was over these farmers did not readily return to the farm for economical reasons. This resulted in little or no cotton history on many farms in Panola County during the base period—1946–48. In fact 1,300 of the 2,860 farms in this county have no cotton history. Many of these farm people that we refer to have returned to their farms now, because industries are catching up with orders and this labor is no longer needed. Since industry is not obligated to pay men they don't need, these people must be allowed the privilege of earning a living and farming is all they know. This county has only 1,000 acres of cotton allotment to give these nonhistory farms and if one-half of this 1,300 apply for an allotment, there will be less than 2 acres of cotton allowed for each farm. On these 1,560 history farms in Panola County, most of them will be allowed less than 14 percent of their cropland for a cotton allotment—the county factor is .1393. This situation makes many farmers unreasonable to talk to and you can hardly blame them. Their normal farm life was interrupted by the war and they became displaced persons for such period and it will take time, even a longer period of time, for their readjustment than most any other industry. By comparison, farmers were allowed over 31 percent of their cropland for a cotton allotment before the war.

You asked about the proposed 70–50 amendment for the sections of the country that we mention, but I doubt if very much relief can come from this amendment. In this country it was necessary to make severe downward adjustments in cotton acreages reported by the farmer, to come within BAE estimates. These adjustments had to be made on an individual farm basis and when the farmer complained he was told that such adjustment would not affect his cotton allotment because at least 1 of the 3 years 1946, 1947, or 1948 had been left reasonably high. We told him wrong if the 70–50 amendment is passed and many appeal cases will result.

You asked what provisions would be needed to give some relief. I will say an amendment as follows would give us much relief and not take too much additional cotton acreage: (1) Irrespective of the county factor, the cotton allotment on any history farm shall not be less than 75 percent of the highest acreage reported by the farmer to be planted to cotton in 1946, 1947, or 1948 but not to exceed 30 percent of the cropland on the farm. (2) Grant additional cotton acreage to the county committee for distribution to extreme hardship cases including nonhistory farms. (3) Allow unused cotton acreage to be returned to the county committee for redistribution to other farms.

This is what I think about the situation in general. We are dealing with the same farmer who grew cotton for 5 and 6 cents per pound in the early thirties. That is why they voted for marketing quotas on December 15, 1949, and not because they were satisfied with their newly established allotment. They do have hopes, however, that some relief will be offered when Congress meets in January. Mr. BECKWORTH, I believe you will agree, it's no time for anyone to be trying to place the blame on the other fellow for criticizing or grabbing glory. The welfare of many people are affected and cannot be helped by "passing the buck." I have confidence in Congress and the Department of Agriculture working out a program fair to the areas of the country that I mention.

Be assured of my sincere appreciation for your personal interest in this subject. With kindest regards, I am,

Yours very truly,

T. L. VINCENT,
Secretary, Panola County PMA.

HENDERSON, TEX., January 10, 1950.

Mr. BECKWORTH.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you in regard to my farms. I have 278.02 acres of cultivated land and five tenant houses and they did not give me any land to work in cotton. It looks like I ought to have got some acres. Everybody around me got some acres but me. I would like for you to tell me how to get some land so the tenants can grow some cotton, if they don't get some it is going to be the worse depression that has been in this part of section in many years.

If there is any way you see to help me, will appreciate it.

Your friend,

H. E. PRICE.

JANUARY 11, 1950.

Mr. B. F. VANCE,
Production and Marketing Administration, Department of Agriculture, College Station, Tex.:

Please wire me immediately why you reserved only 3.7 percent for State reserve cotton acreage rather than 10 percent for reserve.

LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress.

Note why no higher percentage was reserved by the State committee:

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,

Less than 10 percent of State cotton allotment was reserved by committee for the reason that it was felt that the amount reserved was enough to take away from the stable cotton-producing area of Texas. Details relative to studies made by committee too voluminous to wire.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: About 300 to 400 additional acres would be given to Smith County if the 70-percent amendment were added. This is taking into consideration that we were required to adjust downward the reported acreage to get within the BAE figures. If the actual farmers' reported acreage were used as a basis it would greatly help this county.

The number of acres that we have to distribute to old cotton farms which grew cotton first since the war in 1949 is 600 acres, new farms will have to draw their allotment from this same 600 acres. There are 5,600 farms in this county. Only 2,190 of these were eligible to draw a regular cotton allotment. This leaves about 3,400 to draw their allotment from the 600 acres.

Up to the present time we have about 300 requests for this acreage, each day adds a good many more, and it is estimated that we will have at least 500 requests for this acreage by the time we are required to quit taking applications.

Trusting this to be the desired information, I am,

Sincerely,

DAN G. OWEN,
Secretary, Smith County PMA.

Mr. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The proposed amendment to the present cotton-allotment law would help some farms in the county, but this would be a minority of the farms, and it would possibly cause an uproar and protest from those that were not helped.

Under the present law as it now exists the counties were required to reduce the cotton acreage as reported by the farmers so that the total for the county would come within the acreage limits set by BAE. In this (Smith) county the farmers reported planted in 1946, 16,875 acres; BAE said we had 6,340 acres, we were required to reduce it to the BAE figure; in 1947 the farmers reported 16,731 acres, BAE figures were 9,450 acres; in 1948 the farmers reported 20,676 acres, BAE figures were 14,300 acres; in every year we were required to get within BAE figures on cotton.

Local committeemen were used to reduce the reported farm acreages in their respective communities; written notice was given the farmers of the downward adjustments; many protested this downward adjustment on the grounds that it would ruin their average. In many instances a farmer's reported cotton acreage was reduced in 2 of the 3 years to a zero, leaving him 1-year's history, so that county totals could be gotten within BAE limitations. It was explained to the protesting farmers that the average would not be used, and that the 1 year left as reported would prevent his allotment from being limited by his highest planted. Under the proposed amendment the average would be used in the 70 percent of the average planted acres for the 3 years of 1948, 1947, and 1946. Naturally such farms would not benefit from this amendment; under the 50 percent of the highest year few would benefit.

The proposed amendment would help a few farmers and would only serve to make even a greater number mad, if the BAE limitations have to be used.

Trusting this to be the desired information, I am,

Sincerely,

DAN G. OWEN,
Secretary, Smith County PMA.

Congress of the United States, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I am sorry to be late with a reply to your letters of January 3 and January 7, 1950, but I have been busy on peanut-marketing quotas.

The committee of this county has reserved 115.3 acres for new farms. The term "new farm" includes all farms not having cotton history for 1946–48. This acreage has been asked for by approximately 200 farmers. You can see that this would average about one-half acre per new farm.

I sincerely hope this information will aid you in arriving at a solution to the hardships imposed upon east Texas by the present allotment formula.

Sincerely,

HARRIS H. MINTON,
Secretary, Sabine County PMA.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: We believe that the 50–70 amendment would increase Van Zandt County acreage by approximately 4,000 acres.

We have only 427.7 acres of cotton to distribute to all farms which grew cotton first since the war in 1949 and new farms. We feel that around 1,000 farmers will make application for this new grower allotment.

We feel that unless the whole allotment procedure can be revised that House Joint Resolution 384 should be passed with an amendment added to the effect that no allotments will be increased to more than 40 percent of the farm cropland by this resolution.

Very truly yours,

JAMES C. HODGE,
Secretary, Van Zandt County PMA.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In reply to your request on House Joint Resolution 384, I submit the following comments:

1. The bill states that no farm cotton-acreage allotment established for the 1950 crop shall be less than the larger of 70 percent of the average acreage actually planted to cotton on the farm in 1946, 1947, and 1948, or 50 percent of the highest cotton acreage.

This would be excellent if we took the average acreage before the State office forced the county committee in each county office to adjust the cotton acreages reported as planted on a farm so as to lower the county acreage enough to come under the BAE figures sent out from the State office.

Since the BAE figures on cotton for Marion County was several thousand acres lower than the reported acreage from the farmers, the only way the county and community committee could cut within the BAE figures was to take the entire reported acreage away from a farm for 1 or 2 of the 3 years so as not to cut a little off each year and ruin his highest planted. Now, if we go back and take an average of the 3 years, his farm adjusted acreage might show the planted acreage for only 1 year, whereas he actually planted cotton all 3 years.

Unless Congress allows the State and county offices to adjust the BAE figures, which we firmly believe in this county to be completely in error, the adjustment average will not help too much.

If Congress will allow farmers who are not going to plant cotton in 1950 and who have a cotton allotment to release such cotton allotment, we will be able to distribute this extra acreage to farms that need it.

Yours very respectfully,

WALTER C. RALPH,
Secretary, Marion County ACA.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT, COUNCIL OF ECONOMIC ADVISERS,
Washington, D. C., January 13, 1950.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BECKWORTH: Let me acknowledge your communication of January 9.

We are aware that the reinstitution of acreage allotments for cotton under the provisions of Public Law 272 of the present Congress has been attended with difficulties in certain areas. We are glad to have the further information regarding the extent of these difficulties in east Texas conveyed in your communication.

Problems of this sort may appear small in relation to the national economy as a whole, yet they can give rise to serious economic dislocations in the areas affected, as well as in the lives of many individuals, and this makes them a proper matter of national concern.

Such difficulties are perhaps inevitable in connection with the reinstatement of a program as complex as that for the apportionment of cotton acreage, and one that directly affects so large a number of individuals. The need is to be alert to the emergence of these problems, and expeditious in remedying them as they arise.

The Council of Economic Advisers, obviously, is not in a position to judge the local administration of this program in your area. Quite regardless of local administration, however, it is our impression that the primary basis of the problem to be resolved arises out of provisions of the present law regarding which the Department of Agriculture has no discretion of action. We are informed that amendment of these provisions is currently under consideration by the Congress, and that representatives of the Department have made suggestions regarding such amendment.

Although we do not have the detailed familiarity with the complexions of operation of this program that would qualify us to render competent opinion regarding specific aspects of it, we believe that it should be possible to devise amendments of the present law that will remedy difficulties of the types you describe, and that will do within the spirit and intent of the allotment program as a whole.

Certainly we shall watch with interest any action that the Congress may take in this matter.

Very sincerely yours,

LEON H. KEYSERLING,
Acting Chairman.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your letter of November 8 relative to the effect of synthetic fibers upon the future consumption of American cotton.

As you know, the consumption of synthetic fibers in the United States has risen rapidly since staple rayon fiber came into general use during the early 1930's. The increase in the use of rayon fiber has been especially rapid during the past 5 or 6 years. Recently, it has amounted to approximately 17 percent of the amount of cotton that has been consumed in this country. While there are other synthetic fibers such as Nylon that compete to some extent with cotton, its important competitors are rayon and paper. Not only has the use of rayon increased rapidly in the United States during recent years, but it has also increased rapidly in important foreign cotton-consuming countries. During 1948, for example, the use of artificial fibers as a group amounted to 24 percent of that for cotton. In some countries such as Germany, Austria, Sweden, and Switzerland, it amounted to much more, from 20 percent to as high as 50 percent.

It is impossible to foretell what the future holds with respect to increased rayon consumption at the expense of cotton. No one knew 15 years ago when the staple fiber rayon industry was in its infancy that it would be as large as it is today. Perhaps the real answer to the future is what research in the rayon industry may be able to do to impart to rayon those superior characteristics that cotton now possesses. Research, plus an aggressive advertising campaign has largely been responsible for the prominent position rayon occupies today.

I should like to point out, however, that there are some favorable aspects toward maintaining cotton consumption at a reasonably high level, particularly in the United States. The most important factor is a continuing high level of employment and national income. Another important factor is the increase in our population. These two factors, coupled with the fact that cotton fiber still possesses many characteristics superior to rayon and other synthetic fibers, will probably mean a continuing relatively large consumption of cotton fiber in the United States.

As regards foreign markets, which are important for cotton, the situation may be greatly different. While the increase in population abroad will create a continually increased demand for fiber, that demand may not be met with United States cotton due to the lack of dollars abroad with which to pay for it. The outlook for continued exports of cotton in large amounts does not appear favorable at this time for that reason.

I should like to have replied more specifically to the question you raised, but it is of such nature that it can be dealt with only in general terms.

Sincerely yours,

A. J. LOVELAND,
Under Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, November 22, 1949.

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: This is in reply to your letter of November 14 enclosing a newspaper clipping commenting on the report of Senator SPARKMAN'S committee regarding families earning less than $1,000 per year.

The estimates of the number of farm and nonfarm families receiving incomes of less than $1,000 and $2,000, respectively, reported in the newspaper clipping were prepared by Mr. SPARKMAN'S staff from data supplied by the Bureau of the Census in its current population survey. "Income" as the term is used in this report, refers to an estimate by the person interviewed of the total money income of all family members. This includes the net income from the operation of a farm, ranch, business, or profession; money wages and salary; net income from rents; royalties; and cash receipts from various other sources. It should be noted that farm laborer families are included in these estimates of the distribution of farm families by total money income level.

One cannot say categorically that most of the farm families earning less than $1,000 per year are working either on poor or on rich land. First, there are important regional differences in the productivity of land in its present use and in the concentration of low-income farms. Generally speaking, the per-acre value of crops in the Great Plains is lower than in the Southeastern States and the land has a lower market value per acre. Low-income farm families, however, are far more numerous in the Southeast, and represent a much greater proportion of the total number of farms in the latter region than in the Great Plains. The farms are smaller in the Southeast and more of the work is hand labor.

Generally speaking, within the same geographic region the average value of land and buildings per acre increases as the economic size of farm, measured in terms of total value of products sold and used, increases. Yields per acre of the major crops in each respective region likewise were higher in 1944 on commercial-family farms than on small-scale farms. These comparisons suggest a tendency for low-income farming units in a particular geographical area to be concentrated most heavily on the less-productive land. These apparent differences in land quality are not large enough, however, to warrant a conclusion that most of the farm operator families who earn less than $1,000 per year are located on poor land. One cannot draw the conclusion that any given number of farm operator families earn less than $1,000 because they are located on poor land. The annual earnings of a farm operator's family depend primarily upon the total amount of labor, land, and other capital owned and used effectively in farm production, prices received for farm products, and prices paid for items used in farm production. Experience indicates that within a farming area the number of acres operated is a much more important factor determining the net earnings of a farm operator than is the productivity of those acres—assuming, of course, that he has sufficient machinery and managerial skill to operate the larger acreage.

Sincerely yours,

A. J. LOVELAND,
Under Secretary.

At this point I desire to insert a paragraph from the monthly Business Review, of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, which is dated January 1, 1950. It was written by C. H. Moore. Note what is said about the "nearly one-half billion dollars":

WHAT DOES THIS MEAN TO TEXAS AGRICULTURE?

Application of the control program on a substantial scale in Texas during 1950, for the first time in nearly a decade, follows a year in which near-record acreages, together with good to excellent yields, resulted in the largest physical volume of production in the history of the State. Of special significance were the highest per acre yield of cotton in more than 50 years and the record total cotton production. The value of production also was a record, despite some price recession. In contrast with this high production, the 1950 control program calls for a reduction in acreage of the four major crops—cotton, wheat, peanuts, and rice—which would reduce total acreage of Texas crops more than 4,000,000 acres, or 13 percent below the 30,000,000 acres harvested in 1949. Furthermore, if history repeats itself, yields of most crops in 1950 are not likely to equal the very good yields of 1949. Two successive years of favorable weather and high yields for major crops in Texas are unusual. Thus, total volume of production in 1950 appears likely to be substantially below that of 1949; this, together with the probability of some further price decline, would materially reduce the value of production and the income to Texas farmers. For example, the probable production of cotton, based on the allotted acreage of 7,637,000 acres and the 10-year (1940–49) average yield of 181 pounds, would amount to only 2,765,000 bales, or 53 percent less than the 1949 production. On the basis of 1949 prices, the reduction in income as a result of this smaller production would be nearly one-half billion dollars.

At this point I desire to include some data I have received from Mr. B. F. Vance, College Station, Tex.:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,

Hon. LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BECKWORTH: As requested in your wire of January 12, I am attaching a listing sheet showing a distribution of the 1950 State cotton acreage allotment and the State committee reserve of 290,207 acres. The State committee reserve represents 3.8 percent of the total State allotment.

The State committee reserve was required to be used for (1) adjusting computed county allotments and upward trend in cotton planting, (2) abnormal conditions affecting cotton plantings, (3) for assisting county committees with the establishment of fair and equitable allotments for farms whose indicated allotments were between 5 and 15 acres, (4) for assisting county committees with the making of 1950 new farm allotments, and (5) to assist county committees with the making of minimum farm allotments of not less than the smaller of 5 acres or the highest cotton history of the farm during the years 1946–48.

The adjustment in county allotment for abnormal conditions affecting cotton plantings was the most difficult one since it required that consideration be given to (a) all types of weather conditions affecting cotton plantings in 1947 and 1948, (b) soil crusting in irrigated areas, (c) production of designated war crops instead of cotton in 1947, (d) disproportionate movement of farm operators and farm labor to off-farm employment as between counties, and (e) other minor abnormal conditions affecting one or more counties.

The State committee formula for use in distributing the State reserve is as follows:

1. Trend: For counties and administrative areas where the 1948 actual planted cotton acreage exceeds the 1947–48 average planted acreage by more than 10 percent, an allotment adjustment for such trend was computed as the product of (a) the increase in 1948 acreage over 1947 acreage and (b) .0904686.

2. Abnormal conditions: For counties and administrative areas where the 1947–48 average planted acreage is less than the 1941 planted acreage an allotment adjustment for abnormal conditions of production affecting cotton plantings was computed as the product of (a) the decrease in planted acreage from 1941 to the 1947–48 average and (b) 0.0904686.

3. Five- to fifteen-acre allotment farms: For assisting county committees with the adjustment of allotments for 5- to 15-acre allotment farms, 50 percent of the amount of acreage used for this purpose under the 1942 allotment program (but not less than the smaller of 5 acres or the amount actually used under the 1942 program), except that an additional 1,204 acres was allocated to McLennan County, 859 acres to Hill County, and 214 acres to Coryell County above the amounts specified for use in determining fair and equitable allotments for such farms that will be comparable with allotments established for other similar farms in the communities in these three counties.

4. Group II: For assisting county committees with the establishment of Group II (new grower) allotments in 1950, these amounts were allocated:

(a) For counties with official 1950 allotments of less than 1,000 acres: 25 acres, but not more than 25 percent of such official allotment.

(b) For counties with official allotments of 1,000 acres or more but less than 3,000 acres: 50 acres.

(c) For counties with official allotments of 3,000 acres or more but no more than 5,000 acres: 75 acres.

(d) 19,613 acres to certain counties in which substantial acreages of land in farms were devoted to cotton and other crops for the first time in 1949, on the basis of the amount of such cropland of record in the State office.

5. Small-farm increases: The remaining amount of such 3.8 percent State reserve to be added to the State reserve of 5,287 acres, which amounts of allotment are to be used for providing minimum acreage allotments for small farms in all counties.

Very truly yours,

B. F. VANCE,
Chairman, State Committee.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in three separate instances and in each to include extraneous matter.

Mr. GWINN (at the request of Mr. WOODRUFF) was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts asked and was given permission to extend in the RECORD an article on excise taxes printed in the American magazine.

WHO IS "J. SMITH"?

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, what is your reaction when you read the account of an air-line crash and see the incomplete names and addresses of those presumed to be aboard the wrecked plane?

You think of the needless worry, the uncertainty, the confusion.

And you wonder why the air lines are so negligent in this matter.

Perhaps you see the name "J. Smith" listed among the victims, when there might have been many "J. Smith's" in air transit at the time of the tragedy.

And the thought comes to you that it would not be difficult for the air lines to have a complete roster—first name, middle initial, last name, and address, of all passengers and crew members on every flight.

Apparently they do not have such a list available to the press, which is a cause of grave anxiety to many people.

The recent decline in air-passenger traffic in the United States cannot be blamed on the season or the weather alone.

The public has confidence in the planes and the pilots.

More people would like to travel by air, but they have misgivings concerning the controls, the management, and the policies in operation at our airports.

In an effort to overcome these objections in part, I have introduced a bill to amend the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 so as to require the preparation of passenger lists for all flights of commercial air lines. It provides:

That subsection (A) of section 610 of the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by striking out "And" at the end of paragraph (4), by renumbering paragraph (5) as "(6)", and by inserting after paragraph (4) the following new paragraph:

"(5) For any person to transport any passenger in air commerce unless such passenger has registered, in such manner as the Board shall by regulation prescribe, his full name and address and the name and address of an individual to be notified in case of an accident involving the aircraft in which he is to be transported; and."

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect 15 days after the date of its enactment.

THE LATE GEN. HENRY H. "HAP" ARNOLD

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, today I mourn the passing of a great American citizen, a great American warrior, Gen. Henry H. "Hap" Arnold.

I recall meeting the Air Force general with President Roosevelt at the White House during the middle of the late war. The going was rather rough but General Arnold was not terribly concerned. He said: "We are going to win; we are not going to lose. Those kids of mine, most of them in their teens, are knocking the enemy's best out of the air right and left. We are not going to lose." It was in that spirit that General "Hap" Arnold and his boys wrote history in freedom's cause.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I think I express the views of every Member of this House when I say that General Arnold will go down in history as one of the greatest military leaders of all time and one of the greatest servants the American people ever had in time of war.

THE COAL SITUATION

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to read to the House a letter that came to my desk this morning from one of my good friends and a constituent. He writes as follows:

JANUARY 14, 1950.

Hon. L. C. ARENDS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR LES: The coal situation: We have been out of coal for the part 3 days and many of our good customers are out. The only thing that saved them was the mild weather. I wonder just who is running the country. I know from first-hand that most miners want to work, but they have no voice in the affairs of the UMWA. How about applying the antitrust laws to the UMWA? It might be well to look into the legality of John L.'s position. The strip mines are hardest hit of all. Three days in a strip mine means 3 days stripping and 1 to 1½ days' mining. How about having some Senator start impeachment proceedings against the President for not doing his duty in this case.

We have just counted up the customers who have orders in and will be out of coal completely within 3 to 5 days and they total 148 as of now. The Department of the Interior was quoted in this morning's Pantagraph that there was no emergency. The people who are out of coal are in a real state of emergency.

Sincerely.

The writer did not say so, but the people he refers to are neither Democrats nor Republicans. They are American citizens who are either out or will be out of coal in a few days. Maybe it is warm down at the Blair House, where the President lives, but it is getting cold in the homes of many of the people of my district.

Mr. Speaker, Congress accepted the responsibility toward avoiding such emergencies as we now face by writing the Taft-Hartley Act. So I ask, Whose responsibility is it? Certainly the Members of Congress are not to blame but rather the responsibility rests on the shoulders of one man, President Truman, and he should use what machinery he has available to forestall suffering on the part of many of our citizens whose coal bins are empty. After all, the welfare of the people does come ahead of politics.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GOODWIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and to include in each an editorial.

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last I asked and obtained permission to insert an editorial by Mr. David Lawrence and also copy of a report by the Committee on Economic Development on the subject of civilian control and militarism. The Public Printer advises me this extension will cost $389.50. In view of the subject matter covered by the article and the caliber of the committee making the recommendation, I ask unanimous consent that the extension may be made notwithstanding the cost.

The SPEAKER. Notwithstanding the cost and without objection, the extension may be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. JACKSON of California asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article and an editorial.

THE LATE HENRY H. ARNOLD

Mr. SCUDDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCUDDER. Mr. Speaker, nearly 4 years ago one of America's great wartime leaders retired from his role as commanding general of the Army Air Forces. Gen. Henry H. Arnold—he was "Hap" to all, whether a civilian or a military man—sought a quiet life as a gentleman farmer in the lush Sonoma Valley of California, Jack London's famous Valley of the Moon. There he said he wanted to sit under an oak tree and look at white-faced cows.

General Arnold's ranch was only a few miles from my home in Sebastopol. The week before I left Sebastopol to come on to Washington as a Member of Congress, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Murphy, publishers of the Sonoma Index-Tribune, had Mrs. Scudder and myself as house guests. They invited "Hap" Arnold, Mrs. Arnold, and their daughter to the house for dinner. During the evening I had occasion to discuss with the general many things of moment concerning our Government, and especially did we discuss the Chinese problem, over which he was greatly concerned. It is pathetic to lose students of world affairs in such times as these.

Even after his retirement General Arnold remained active in Air Force affairs and could be seen on occasion in his office at Hamilton Air Force Base in Marin County, Calif. There less than a year ago he was presented with a model of the plane in which the Wright brothers taught him to fly in 1911. This model he added to his collection at Sonoma, a collection which characteristically the general made available for public display.

When one looks at this kitelike plane he is impressed with its flimsiness. And he is impressed further that from this very small beginning was built the mighty aerial armada which made such telling blows on the Axis Nations in World War II. This force of 2,300,000 men and 80,000 planes of all types—the wartime United States Army Air Forces and the Air Force of today—are great monuments to his lifetime of labor and statesmanship in its behalf.

Flags throughout the United States fly at half-mast today. It is entirely fitting that a peaceful and nonmilitaristic Nation should pay this respect to one of its greatest soldiers. For General Arnold was not only a military man, but a plain citizen as well—a man who believed sincerely in the orderly processes of a democracy, who abhorred war and worked throughout his lifetime for a real and just peace. He contended that such a peace can be maintained through strength. He labored in behalf of his beliefs. Today a policy of strong defense, with the Air Force as its keystone, stands as the avowed aim of this Government.

Gen. Henry H. Arnold—"Hap" Arnold—has passed from the scene. In his departure he is mourned by all in these United States. To me he was a counselor and friend. The memory of "Hap" Arnold will remain indelibly with me, as it will with all the people who knew him.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. RICH asked and was given permission to address the House today for 15 minutes following disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk and at the conclusion of any special orders heretofore entered.

I AM NOT A DEMOCRAT

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, a news article which appeared in a paper caused a letter to be written to me which I want to read because someone is really taking advantage of me through the newspapers and I do not like it. The news article is as follows:

"Be nifty and thrifty in '50," says economy advocate Representative RICH (D., Pa.). This lawmaker used to shout, almost every time a spending proposal came up: "Where are we going to get the money?"

You see they listed me as a (D) meaning Democrat. Now I insert the letter I received from one I knew 45 years ago:

JANUARY 10, 1950.

Hon. ROBERT F. RICH,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. RICH: I see by the enclosed clipping you have turned Democrat. How horrible. Don't you realize that the conscience—the Democratic conscience—has lost its eyes and ears and that two more years of deficits will find us going into a tailspin and paternalism or communism (identities) or any other ism will not be able to avert the crash in which all that is worth while will be destroyed. The first indication of this fatal disaster will be a mass realization that Government securities are unsound, which they will be, and then the tailspin of a run on the (Treasury) bank for redemption. And what will the cash they will get be worth? This is no joke. It is a probability more than a possibility. I understand the incapacity of the crosscut of our people to think in time before the catastrophe is recognized, and they alone can save their land of plenty—but we, the people, are damn fools because we cannot think in time to realize that those in control, without vision or consistency or much conscience, dominate their even more selfish or weaker brethren. But you, a Democrat!

Respectfully,

FRYSINGER EVANS.

Mr. Speaker, I want to deny this accusation that I am a Democrat with all the vehemence at my command. I am and always will be a Republican. I will do all I can in aiding the Republican Party to do those things that will make our country the best country in all the world, for all of our people, at all times.

THE LATE HENRY H. ARNOLD

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I read in this morning's newspapers, with great sadness of the death of General Arnold. It was not generally known by Members of the Congress that General Arnold became an aviator by chance or perhaps one might say by accident.

In 1907 he was graduated from the Military Academy and was commissioned in the Infantry. He went to his Congressman and requested that he be placed in the Cavalry. His request was not granted and he was sent to the Philippines as a second lieutenant in the Infantry. Later he returned to America, and in 1911 he was transferred to the Signal Corps and became one of the pioneer aviators in the armed services of the United States. "Hap" Arnold as he was known won many honors as a young aviator. He really did not come into his own until after the First World War. When the Chief of the Air Corps, General Westover, was killed in 1939 Arnold was made the Chief of the Air Corps and was elevated to the rank of major general.

Like others, he saw trouble coming and he and his associates made the plans on which our tremendous Air Force was made possible when the war came to us. Under his leadership we had formulated a plan that sprouted until we produced over 50,000 planes a year and also we had the machinery and facilities to train the thousands of pilots, bombardiers, and navigators to man and operate these planes. This great air armada, which operated in every theater in the war was made possible through the leadership and vision of General Arnold and those who worked closely with him. He really was the spark plug that made all of this possible.

He became a young officer in the United States Army in 1907. At that time there was no fear of war and we all felt America would be secure for generations. Yet he lived through two great wars. He saw the destructive power of weapons greatly enhanced through the use of airplanes. He lived to see air power develop into the most deadly and destructive thing in the whole world. The planes built under the guidance of the Air Force carried the atom bomb. The destruction wrought by the planes sent out under his direction laid waste two great nations in the world. He worked so hard that his heart was overstrained and he finally had to take it easy.

But after he retired to beautiful Sonoma he still kept in touch with our security problems. In 1949 he appeared before a committee of which I was a member, which investigated the problems surrounding the procurement of the B–36. At that time he looked thin and tired but the old spark was there.

When he wrote a series of articles for the Washington Post I think he showed that he was more than just a great general. He was a statesman and a humanitarian. He had seen enough to know that under modern conditions war should be made impossible, or the human race might destroy itself. In one of these articles he dwelt on this and pointed out that the nations must find some way, besides war, to settle their differences. He advocated a large military establishment as a peace weapon. He knew and said that if two great industrial nations came to grips in a war they would both lose, even though one of them was declared the winner.

We sympathize with his family over their great loss. But they should find great comfort from the fact that their loved one contributed much toward the victory which we all hope will bring peace to the world. His men and the other services working as a team destroyed two vicious and inhuman dictators. We all hope that his hopes for peace and good will on this old world will come to pass. He will be missed by thousands who knew him personally and by millions who admired him.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include two editorials.

Mr. JENSEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial appearing in Newsweek, republished in the Des Moines Sunday Register, December 18.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. REED of New York asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include extraneous matter.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD to pay tribute to the accomplishments of the late Gen. Hap Arnold.

THE COAL SHORTAGE

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, the coal shortage in my district is now serious. I wish to serve notice on this House that if it continues and if we get the same kind of weather in Nebraska as we had last year there will be loss of life. Mr. Clarence Isaacson, one of the prominent coal dealers, called me by telephone this morning. He was speaking for the coal dealers of my home town, Norfolk, Nebr. He stated that the town is entirely out of stoker coal and that other grades are being depleted. He and these coal dealers want something done at once to relieve this situation. Members of this House will recall that last winter the "snow lift" operations in Nebraska resulted in saving life because operators of airplanes hauled fuel and medicines to the isolated farmers. If the weather changes and "snow lift" conditions come again there will be no coal for the airmen to fly. There will be much suffering. I am merely calling your attention to this serious situation and am putting those responsible for this condition on notice. Something must be done about it at once. By passing this information on to the members of the House of Representatives I hope it will come to the attention of those who can and should do something about it now. It has been very cold in Nebraska. A short time ago, I am informed, it was 32° below zero at some places in the State.

COTTON-ACREAGE ALLOTMENT

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it would be amusing if it was not tragic to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH], who speaks from his head as well as from his heart, and the comment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox]. Now, over the years, who wrote this legislation affecting cotton, anyway, the legislation of which you now complain? You fellows on the Democratic side, the New Dealers, the Fair Dealers. Day after day you have been coming in here and squawking and bellyaching about it. Why do you not change it? Will not the big boss permit it, if he is ruining your cotton farmers, as you claim this legislation is? He and John L. Lewis, between them, are fixing it so our people in the North are cold, eat cold meals, go to bed to keep warm. You lack either the inclination or the courage to do the job. You will not let us do it.

VETERANS' INSURANCE

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, on Friday I went to the Veterans' Administration office where they are getting out insurance overpayments checks to the veterans. The Veterans' Administration call them dividends, but they are not dividends. It is money the veterans paid into the insurance funds themselves as overpayments. Our Committee on Veterans' Affairs made an investigation in the last session of Congress and report that I think are responsible for the getting out of these checks, even though belatedly. They are coming out today.

There is a misunderstanding even among the press. Some of the press are writing editorials saying that this is a sort of bonus given to the veterans. It is in no sense a bonus. It is a business proposition. It is an overpayment that the veterans made for their insurance. This money belongs to them. It is a debt owed to the veterans that is being paid to them at last.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio (at the request of Mr. VORYS) was given permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Mr. VAN ZANDT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a report of the Altoona Chamber of Commerce for the calendar year 1949.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances, and include in one an exchange of telegrams with the American Legion of South Dakota and in the other an editorial.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter.

Mr. JENKINS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include two releases.

Mr. KEATING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include extraneous matter.

THE LATE GEN. H. H. ARNOLD

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, to the extent that victory went to air power during World War II, it should be a matter of national mourning that the chief architect of our air power in the war passed away yesterday.

It was my privilege to see Gen. "Hap" Arnold at close range during the war years and the years immediately prior thereto as a member of the committee making appropriations for the Air Force. I have seen him when he was stern, I have seen him when he was gentle, I have seen him when he was harassed and harried by all the problems of production during the war, I have seen him when he sensed victory. We instinctively admired him, who could be cheerful in the face of trial, who was sad when the price of victory was the life of young American boys, and yet who kept his eye unswervingly on the goal. The fact that we achieved it is the real tribute to him.

In South Dakota we shall remember him as the pilot who flew the mail in for President Coolidge when the summer White House was the State Game Lodge in the Black Hills. He was on that mail run, we have understood, because he was in disgrace for having supported Gen. Billy Mitchell's point of view on the importance of air power in national defense.

That point of view prevailed, however, and eventually Major Arnold became Gen. H. H. Arnold, Chief of the United States Air Force that knocked the famed Luftwaffe out of the skies, smashed the transportation system of the enemy in Europe and then destroyed the initiative of the enemy in the Pacific and carried the atomic bomb to Hiroshima. I would not detract one iota from the credit due anyone in the great record written by every unit and branch of the armed forces in World War II, but to the extent that air power contributed to final victory it is only proper to say that the Nation suffered a great loss when the chief architect of our air power in World War II died yesterday.

General Arnold's life was unquestionably shortened by the tension of his service in the war. He was a great American and one of the greatest of all times.

FOREIGN TRADE POLICY

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, many industries in the United States are in a bad way because of the foreign-trade policy of the present administration. The situation has become so serious that many employees and employers are joining together to combat this growing menace to their employment and business.

The New Deal doctrine that some industries should be sacrificed for the benefit of others does not go well with those that are being sacrificed.

Tomorrow there will be a big meeting here in Washington, participated in by management and labor working together and both fighting together for their economic lives. The so-called New Deal trade agreements have seriously affected pottery and glassware output and also the production of matches, cedar shingles, fish and sea food, scientific instruments, gloves—both leather and wool—hats and millinery, hothouse vegetables, aluminum products, kaolin and book products.

The constant efforts of Secretary Acheson and of Mr. Hoffman and others to persuade the public to buy foreign goods rather than those made in this country threaten the continued existence of these very important industries.

Top-ranking representatives of both labor and management in these industries, over 50 of them, will join tomorrow in this meeting to fight to preserve these industries and the jobs that they provide.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, the many requests I have received from people outside my own district asking for copies of the speech I made on January 12, which you will find in the RECORD on pages A212, entitled "Defenseless America," suggests it might be worth while for a Congressman or two to read it.

I would like to continue by suggesting that sea power will be vital to the Atlantic Alliance.

With great stretches of ocean between the participating members of the Atlantic alliance the sea lanes must be avenues for both military and economic supplies.

Only sea-air power can keep them open.

In my opinion, we need not only one big carrier—we need a half dozen.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks and include a newspaper article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

[Mr. HALE addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

LET US KEEP THE PENNY POSTAL RATE

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I was very much upset when, a few minutes ago, I heard the report that the old bugbear of doubling the penny postal card rate is to be brought up before long. I thought we fought that battle out last year. But I fear once again that this way of putting the tax on the poor man is coming up before the Congress. I hope there will be enough Members to defeat such a bill, because it is definitely against the interests of the people. It is the only way left for the rank and file to send messages in any profusion through the mails. I believe the penny postcard should be retained, and I hope the House will not take action to the contrary.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT AGREEMENT

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, since the end of the war one of our major outlets for wheat has been Germany and Japan. This wheat has been purchased by the United States Army and paid for by the taxpayers of this country. This will be necessary as long as the occupation lasts, because these countries cannot produce enough food to supply their people. The amount so consumed has been more than 150,000,000 bushels per year.

Today representatives of the member nations of the International Wheat Agreement are meeting in London to consider the admission of western Germany and Japan as members of the International Wheat Agreement. It is my understanding that our delegate to this meeting has been instructed to vote for the admission of Germany and Japan. If they are admitted, it means that they will hereafter secure most, if not all, of their wheat imports under the International Wheat Agreement. But that is not all. As soon as these countries are admitted, Canada and Australia will demand that 30,000,000 bushels of the wheat so imported into Germany and Japan under the agreement be allotted to them as exporters. If this demand is granted, 30,000,000 bushels of the wheat which in the past has been supplied by United States producers and paid for by the taxpayers of the United States and which will continue to be paid for by the taxpayers of the United States, will be supplied by the wheat growers of Canada and Australia, who have not been asked to reduce their acreage and who will never have to reduce their acreage if we continue to turn over to them export markets which rightfully belong to us.

In the meantime, our wheat exports are shrinking, surpluses are accumulating, and the farmers of the United States, pursuant to the acreage allotment program announced by the Secretary of Agriculture, are cutting their wheat acreage by 10,000,000 acres.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOEVEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. MACK of Washington asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and include extraneous material.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances; in two to include editorials, and in the third, an article from the Kiwanis magazine.

Mr. GAVIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and to include two editorials and one newspaper article.

JACKSON DAY DINNER

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note the first Jackson Day dinner, on January 8, 1835, was held to celebrate the fact that the new little Republic was free from debt. The United States had no national debt. The Jackson Day dinners throughout the country this year are presumably being held to celebrate the fact that, under Harry S. Truman, the United States has a national debt of over $257,000,000,000, the largest peacetime debt in our history, and perhaps to celebrate the fact that in time of peace and employment, this debt is being increased at the rate of from five to ten billions a year. I rise to remind my Democratic friends that the purpose of the Jackson Day dinner seems to have changed in 115 years.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I yield.

Mr. DINGELL. How did the gentleman vote on the tax cut in the Eightieth Congress?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I voted for all tax cuts.

Mr. DINGELL. I thought so.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PHILLIPS of California asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

Mr. TOLLEFSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

Mr. CRAWFORD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter.

Mr. SADLAK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include two editorials.

Mr. JUDD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in four instances and in each to include extraneous matter.

Mr. MILLER of California asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday, following the business of the day and any other special orders, I may address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BENTSEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

QUEEN OF AMERICA

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to express my appreciation to the thousands of women's clubs and clubwomen throughout America who participated in the recent Queen of America contest on the Mutual Broadcasting System's Queen for a Day program.

This queen was not selected for her beauty qualifications alone, instead, she was chosen by women's club representatives for her voluntary contributions in the field of public service, particularly among distressed and underprivileged people.

It is with great personal pride that I mention Mrs. Sally Baker, a resident of Pikeville, Ky. She has given over a quarter century of her life aiding the people in the villages and mountains of eastern Kentucky. She was highly praised by hospitals, churches, and citizens and charity groups. She is truly the "queen of America." Shortly she will depart for a European tour to talk with individuals and groups participating in club work and humanitarian endeavors there. I am sure that the Mutual Broadcasting System, its Queen for a Day program, and clubwomen of America have made a wise selection. Mrs. Sally Baker, of my own State of Kentucky, and from my own congressional district, is a worthy ambassador of good will. She represents the type of womanhood that makes up eastern Kentucky.

THE PENNY POSTAL CARD

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL] about the proposed increase in rates on the penny postal card. I would like to call his attention to the fact that we subsidize business in a big way through the present penny postal card. It costs about 2.6 cents to deliver each penny postal card, and 90 percent of them are used by business firms in the solicitation of business or in the conduct of their business. This is a hidden subsidy that the Government is paying them. It is to wipe out a part of this subsidy that the bill I have mentioned was introduced.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of California. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is just another attempt to wipe out a part of that deficit that the gentleman and his party have been talking about so much?

Mr. MILLER of California. That is right.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of California. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Why do you not bring a bill in here to raise the penny post card, and why do you not raise the price of parcel post, and a lot of things, and let them try to pay their own way? You will get a vote over here on that.

Mr. MILLER of California. I will tell the gentleman there is a bill, H. R. 2945, that is presently before the Rules Committee, that has been reported, and we hope to get it before the House shortly, which raises the penny postal card. It also serves notice on the people who receive these postal subsidies that we are going to end them. At the present time many businesses predicate that business on the subsidies they receive from the Government in the form of special treatment. We hope in time to end this practice and eliminate the so-called postal deficit.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman's bill pay its way?

Mr. MILLER of California. Yes; part of it, not all of it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GRANGER asked and was given permission to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio broadcast, notwithstanding the fact that it exceeds the limit established by the Joint Committee on Printing and will cost $328.

Mr. HOLIFIELD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous material.

Mr. CLEMENTE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the story of the development of the typographical union.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

Mr. THOMPSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. COLMER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in two separate instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. DINGELL asked and was given permission to insert in the RECORD a speech by the Honorable M. W. Szymczak, a member of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, notwithstanding the fact that it exceeds the limit prescribed by the Joint Committee on Printing and will cost $191.34.

Mr. ANGELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial on pensions and general welfare, written by E. B. Clark, of his district.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes on Wednesday next, or if there be no session of the House that day, then on the following day, at the conclusion of the legislative business of the day and any special orders heretofore entered, on the subject Those Are Your Tax Laws.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

EDITORIAL ABILITY

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, on last Wednesday my local paper, the Akron Beacon-Journal, which is one of a chain having papers in Detroit, Miami, and Chicago, sponsored a high-school day and allowed high-school students to edit the paper. Two of the students, Shirley Schley, of St. Vincent High School, and Joe Cooper, of West High School, wrote editorials on the so-called welfare state.

While we may or may not agree with their thinking, I am sure we will all agree that their freshness of thought is most inspiring. In view of the soggy drivel which most of our country's newspapers inflict upon the reading public, I would suggest that many of them should recruit high-school students to write all of their editorials.

No doubt some editorial writers may reply that we should elect high-school students to Congress, and to that I would have no objection.

Reporters by and large get out and learn the facts, but too many editorial writers grind out the same old tunes, with never a new thought or idea. So I commend the editorials of these young people to the attention of the Members:

TWO VIEWS ON THE WELFARE STATE

As the 1950 campaign opens, both Democrat and Republican leaders are vigorously engaged in shaping party platforms. Already the welfare state, that much-used and much-abused term, has entered the controversy.

Philip Willkie, Republican representative to the Indiana State Legislature, substituted for this term one which better describes the goal of many Republicans. Mr. Willkie appeals for the opportunity state. In essence, his plan might be summed up as public welfare through private funds.

Liberal Republicans are quite willing to agree that during the past 20 years the American concept of a democratic form of government has changed. Members of Congress are now charged not only with the responsibility of guarding the present welfare of the public, but with obtaining better conditions for more people. Besides the basic freedoms, many workers of today are asking for security.

There has been an increasing tendency to obtain this security at the price of destroying individuality. A person is not regarded as capable of thought and action, but rather as a statistic, an automaton that pays income tax and receives social security.

Incentive was the spark that kindled early American democracy. Why not put this powerful force to work again?

A few experiments along this line have been made in the past and proved successful. The New York Port Authority, with the cooperation of both New York and New Jersey, has succeeded in building and maintaining airports, bridges, and tunnels. These, while used by the public, have been financed exclusively with private funds. Similar action by New York City has made possible the building of modern low-cost housing by private concerns.

When the Roosevelt administration took office, there was little private capital available for this type of development. Now that the situation has almost reversed itself, it is time to take advantage of it.

It remains for America to take advantage of the ingenuity and incentive that has made her great.

SHIRLEY SCHLEY,
St. Vincent High School.

We have been progressing toward a welfare state from time immemorial. Each century has seen a more intelligent man, a more progressive man, and a man willing to do more for himself and for humanity. The trend through the ages has been toward a more liberal form of government.

The Government of the United States has followed the trend. We have had a type of welfare state ever since the first tariff was levied, ever since the Government started subsidizing groups in the country, and ever since there has been a United States Post Office Department.

The fact that we've had a type of welfare state ever since we've been a nation is what the opponents of a welfare state have overlooked in their zeal to discredit it. When they continue to contend that they are against all the principles of a welfare state completely they fail to realize that this places them in opposition to fire and police departments, waterworks, tariffs, Federal grants, even the postal system. Clearly the issue is not whether to have a welfare state, but rather to what extent to have a welfare state.

The welfare state should go to this extent:

1. It should protect and safeguard the individual from matters over which the individual has no control, but which can harm him, such as sickness, accident, old age, depression, and inflation, to mention a few.

2. It should guarantee our citizens equal social, moral, and economic opportunities and equalize these opportunities. This includes civil rights and aid to education.

3. It should provide for the general welfore of the people by stepping in whenever the people need and want something they are not receiving adequately through private funds. A good example on this point is the Government's housing program.

Truly a welfare state is just a state designed more and more to help the people help themselves. Actually a welfare state is a Fair Deal state.

Many liberal Republicans will concede the need for certain welfare legislation but they will argue, "Let's do it through private funds." This is a utopian attitude. Private business on the whole is neither willing nor able to provide for the public welfare. The Government is the people's instrument and because it is both able and willing, it looks out for the public welfare.

Others condemn the welfare state because it can be mismanaged or because it can be carried too far and become socialism. That is true. Anything can be mismanaged or carried too far.

The people need and want a welfare state. They proved it in the last election. We should not look at the welfare state seeing only its cost and not its value.

JOE COOPER,
West High School.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—SECOND ANNUAL REPORT FOR THE PHILIPPINE ALIEN PROPERTY ADMINISTRATION (H. DOC. NO. 449)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and together with the accompanying papers referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the second annual report for the Philippine Alien Property Administration for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1948.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 13, 1950.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—THE RUBBER POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 448)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and together with the accompanying papers referred to the Committee on the Armed Services and ordered to be printed, with illustrations:

To the Congress of the United States:

The tremendous increase in the use of rubber is one of the outstanding features of our industrial development in the last 50 years. Rubber has become indipensable to the United States, in both peace and war. Yet, 10 years ago this country was dependent for practically all of its supply of this essential material on areas halfway around the world. Early in World War II these areas were lost, and it became necessary to develop a domestic source of rubber. The creation, in the midst of war, of a new industry capable of supplying a million tons of synthetic rubber a year was one of the great achievements of our war effort.

Since the war, the sources of natural rubber have again become available to us, and production has increased as the destruction and dislocations of war have been overcome. At the same time, the world demand for rubber has risen so far above the prewar levels that the supply of natural rubber is still less than demand. Thus, continued production of synthetic rubber in this country has prevented a serious world rubber shortage.

Facilities for producing general-purpose synthetic rubber, commonly called GR–S, are owned by the Government, as are the plants for producing butyl, the type of synthetic rubber used primarily in inner tubes. Facilities for producing other types of synthetic rubber are now all privately owned. In 1949 about 289,000 long tons of GR–S and 52,000 long tons of butyl were produced by the Government. In addition, about 53,000 long tons of other synthetic rubbers were produced in privately owned plants.

It is essential to our national security that facilities to produce enough high-quality synthetic rubber to meet our needs in an emergency be continuously available. We must build up a stock pile of natural rubber, and we have been doing so, but the accumulation of a stock pile large enough to meet all emergency needs for rubber is impractical. We must be equipped to meet the bulk of our needs from domestically produced rubber.

The Government's synthetic rubber activities are now conducted under the Rubber Act of 1948, which expires on June 30, 1950. This legislation provides that capacity for production of synthetic rubber shall be maintained in the United States at all times, and requires that minimum quantities shall be produced and consumed each year. It provides authority for continued Government production of synthetic rubber, for regulations requiring its consumption in certain products, for stand-by maintenance of plants not in operation, and for continued Government research in synthetic rubber. Although the act prohibits the disposal of the facilities in the synthetic rubber program, it declares it to be the policy of the Congress that Government ownership shall terminate whenever consistent with national security. The act provides that on or before January 15, 1950, the President shall recommend to the Congress "legislation with respect to disposal of Government-owned rubber-producing facilities * * * together with such other recommendations as he deems desirable and appropriate."

As a basis for making recommendations to the Congress, I have had made a thorough investigation of all aspects of the rubber problem. A report summarizing the results of this investigation is transmitted to the Congress with this message. The detailed recommendations in that report have my approval.

The rubber policy of the United States should be based upon the fundamental national objectives of protection of the national security, promotion of a free competitive economy, and achievement of a peaceful and prosperous world. I recommend that legislation succeeding the Rubber Act of 1948 be enacted, setting forth this rubber policy, and providing for continuation of the synthetic rubber industry in a manner consistent with these objectives.

In order to maintain the productive capacity needed in the event of emergency, the President should have the authority to designate the plants which must be kept available at all times for synthetic rubber production. On the basis of present technology and estimated requirements, it appears that our present plant capacity of nearly a million tons a year should be maintained to be prepared to meet emergency needs for synthetic rubber. It is not necessary, however, that all this capacity be in operation. Maintenance in a stand-by condition of those plants which are not being used should, therefore, be authorized.

In order to encourage technological development in the production and use of synthetic rubber and to provide a basis for rapid expansion of production if this proves necessary, at least a minimum quantity of each type of synthetic rubber must be produced and consumed. Certain types of synthetic rubber, which are privately manufactured, have established a sufficiently strong position in the competitive market to assure a continuing demand for them. Recent improvements in butyl rubber, which is produced only in Government-owned plants, make it superior to natural rubber for use in inner tubes, its major use. It is probable, therefore, that as soon as private production of butyl begins, this type of synthetic rubber will be produced and consumed in adequate volume in a competitive market. Until butyl is privately produced, however, the President should have the authority to determine the minimum quantities of butyl which must be produced and consumed, and to the extent necessary to require its use in specified products.

The situation with respect to general-purpose synthetic rubber (GR–S) is not quite so favorable. Since it is not yet a satisfactory substitute for natural rubber in all of the products for which it would be used in an emergency, it is desirable that the Government's authority to conduct research in this field continue. The physical properties of GR–S have been steadily improved in recent years, and at present the quality differences between GR–S and natural rubber for peacetime general-purpose uses (chiefly passenger-car tires) are not significant. Price differentials are likely to be the determining factor in the choice between the two rubbers for most uses. It is very possible that for some time to come a considerable volume of GR–S production will be required, since the supply of natural rubber is not likely to be sufficient to meet world market demand. This possibility, however, is not an adequately dependable base for national security planning.

I believe that, at the present time, at least one-quarter of total consumption of GR–S and natural rubber, and not less than 200,000 long tons annually, should be GR–S. However, the needed level of production and consumption may change over the next few years with changes in world conditions. Therefore, the President should be given the authority to establish from time to time the minimum level of production and consumption necessary to the national security.

The present technological position of general-purpose synthetic rubber is such that it probably could not compete for bulk uses with natural rubber offered at significantly lower prices. There is thus no adequate assurance that the demand for GR–S either because of the possible shortage of natural rubber or because of its technological qualities, will be sufficient to insure production and consumption at levels necessary for national security. The President should, therefore, have authority to require the use of GR–S in certain products to the extent necessary to assure such production and consumption.

The minimum level of production and consumption should not be higher than the national security requires, for if it were, it would unduly prevent consumers in this country from realizing the benefits of market competition, and interfere with our objectives of expanding world trade and world prosperity.

It is my earnest hope that controls on consumption of GR–S may be reduced or suspended over the next few years, as technological improvements result in increasing quantities of general-purpose synthetic rubber being consumed without Government support. This development should be stimulated by the disposal of the Government's plants to private owners.

The President should be authorized to dispose of the synthetic rubber facilities to private owners, under conditions which will protect the national security and promote effective competition.

The disposal of these plants while promoting effective competition will present many difficult problems. The plants are large and involve large-scale operations. Furthermore, only a few plants are required to meet the probable demand for both required and anticipated voluntary consumption of synthetic rubber. The legislation authorizing disposal should take account of these facts, and provide specific standards designed to assure that the disposal program will actively promote effective competition and avoid monopolistic concentration.

A special problem will arise when general-purpose synthetic rubber plants are privately owned, if the Government continues to require the use of synthetic rubber in certain products. In this situation, the Government must see that synthetic rubber is made available on fair and reasonable terms and conditions to those required to use it. Such Government intervention in the normal buyer-seller relationship will present difficult practical problems for both industry and Government. Development of a vigorous private synthetic rubber industry, however, may soon result in adequate consumption of synthetic rubber to permit removal of Government regulation.

I believe that the policies outlined in this message and the detailed recommendations contained in the accompanying report provide a sound program for action. For this reason, the legislation establishing these policies can be of relatively long duration. Furthermore, a firmly established legislative framework is highly desirable if disposal of the Government's synthetic rubber plants is to be successful. I recommend the adoption of legislation of 10 years' duration in order to provide adequate protection of the national security and to contribute to the development of a vigorous, competitive, and privately owned synthetic-rubber industry in the United States.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. This is Consent Calendar day. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

RESIDENT COMMISSIONER FROM THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

The Clerk called the first bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 2988, to provide for a Resident Commissioner from the Virgin Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

BENEFITS FOR ANNUITANTS WHO RETIRED PRIOR TO APRIL 1, 1948

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 4295) to provide benefits for annuitants who retired under the Civil Service Retirement Act of May 29, 1930, prior to April 1, 1948.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

ERECTION AND OPERATION OF A MUSEUM AT KLUKWAN, ALASKA

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 2012) to authorize the erection and operation of a museum at Klukwan, Alaska.

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

PRACTITIONERS BEFORE ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 4446) to protect the public with respect to practitioners before administrative agencies.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL CEMETERY AT FORT LOGAN, COLO.

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 4548) to provide for the utilization as a national cemetery of surplus Army Department owned military real property at Fort Logan, Colo.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

PUBLIC AIRPORTS SERVING NATIONAL PARKS, NATIONAL MONUMENTS, AND NATIONAL RECREATION AREAS.

The Clerk called the bill (S. 1283) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire, construct, operate, and maintain public airports in, or in close proximity to, national parks, monuments, and recreation areas, and for other purposes.

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

FOREIGN AGRICULTURAL LABOR

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 5557) to provide for coordination of arrangements for the employment of agricultural workers, admitted for temporary agricultural employment from foreign countries in the Western Hemisphere, to assure that the migration of such workers will be limited to the minimum numbers required to meet domestic labor shortages, and for other purposes.

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

FOREST RECREATIONAL RESOURCES

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 2419) relating to the disposition of moneys received from the national forests.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

PROVIDING FOR THE CONSTRUCTION OF CERTAIN VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION HOSPITALS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 5965) to provide for the construction of certain Veterans' Administration hospitals, and for other purposes.

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

PROVIDING FOR THE SETTLEMENT OF CERTAIN PARTS OF ALASKA BY WAR VETERANS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 4424) to provide for the settlement of certain parts of Alaska by war veterans.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

AMENDING THE FEDERAL AIRPORT ACT

The Clerk called the bill (S. 1282) to authorize grants under the Federal Airport Act for minor projects at major airports, and for other purposes.

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

ALASKA AIRPORTS

The Clerk called the bill (S. 2436) to amend the act entitled "An act to authorize the construction, protection, operation, and maintenance of public airports in the Territory of Alaska."

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

SERVICEMEN'S READJUSTMENT ACT

The Clerk called the bill (S. 2596) relating to education or training of veterans under title II of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act (Public Law 346, 78th Cong., June 22, 1944).

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. That completes the list of the eligible bills on the Consent Calendar.

Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GOSSETT] is recognized for 10 minutes.

THREE HUNDRED MILLION ADDITIONAL REVENUE FROM IMPORTED OIL

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill which should raise approximately $300,000,000 a year from a relatively untaxed source, to wit, foreign crude oil imports and derivatives thereof. Furthermore, such a measure would furnish some sorely needed protection to American labor and American industry. Why should we permit comparatively untaxed, unregulated foreign industry and labor to destroy heavily taxed, heavily regulated domestic labor and industry? Not only is the American petroleum industry being crowded out of world markets but we are permitting world markets to move into this country and displace a domestic production of which this country produces and can continue to produce a great surplus. This is not good business or good economics and is not in the public interest.

Mr. Speaker, the bill I have today introduced is as follows:

A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code by increasing the excise tax on imported crude petroleum and crude petroleum derivatives

Be it enacted, etc., That it is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress, in view of the essentiality of petroleum and derivatives thereof to the welfare and security of the Nation, to encourage the development and maintenance of sources of petroleum within the United States in order to prevent a dangerous and unnecessary dependence by the United States upon foreign sources for supplies of petroleum. It is further declared to be the policy of Congress that imported petroleum and derivatives thereof should not be permitted to destroy domestic industry or displace domestic labor, and further should be required to make a fair and equitable contribution to Federal revenues.

SEC. 2. To carry out the policy of this act section 3422 (53 Stat. 414) of the Internal Revenue Code hereby is amended to provide import taxes on petroleum and derivatives as follows:

"Crude petroleum and all liquid derivatives of crude petroleum, except lubricating oil, 2½ cents per gallon; lubricating oil, 4 cents per gallon; paraffin and other petroleum wax products, 1 cent per pound."

SEC. 3. For the purposes of administering section 3420 and section 3422 of the Internal Revenue Code imports of petroleum and derivatives thereof shall include imported petroleum and derivatives thereof for supplies for vessels at United States ports, but shall exclude petroleum and derivatives thereof imported for manufacture and reexport.

SEC. 4. The import taxes established by this act shall apply notwithstanding any action heretofore taken pursuant to the authority of section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, and shall not be subject to increase or decrease or modification in any matter whatever under the authority of section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, or any other law.

Imports of foreign oil into the United States are now averaging approximately 750,000 barrels daily. Practically all of this is either, first, crude oil; or, second, residual fuel oil. About two-thirds of the total is crude oil and about one-third is residual fuel oil. Imports of other petroleum products such as gasoline, kerosene, and home heating oils are insignificant and do not today present a problem. The bill I have introduced, therefore, is directed mainly at crude oil and residual fuel oil which are causing the present injury being suffered by the domestic industry.

In 1932 Congress established a tax on crude oil and residual fuel oil of 21 cents a barrel. Under the trade agreements with Venezuela in 1939 and Mexico in 1943 this tax was reduced to one-half of its original amount or 10½ cents per barrel. It is generally recognized that a tax of 10½ cents a barrel on crude oil and residual fuel oil is ineffective in placing imports on a competitive basis with the domestic industry and it is insufficient to prevent foreign oil from taking over the home markets as has been occurring during the past few years. To place foreign oil on a basis that will prevent it from further displacement of American labor, from further absorption of the home markets and from further destruction of the domestic industry, will require a substantial increase in the existing taxes. I am, therefore, proposing that a tax of 2½ cents per gallon or $1.05 per barrel be established on both crude oil and residual fuel oil.

The tax established by Congress in 1932 on gasoline and other motor fuels was 2½ cents per gallon, on lubricating oil, 4 cents per gallon; and on paraffin and wax products, 1 cent per pound. Under the trade-agreements program all of these taxes have been reduced by 50 percent. I am proposing that these taxes, which were intended by Congress to be outside the purview of the trade-agreements program, be restored to their original amounts.

The legislative history of the Trade Agreements Act shows it was the understanding and the intent of Congress when it provided Executive authority in 1934 to negotiate trade agreements that the excise taxes on oil, coal, copper, and lumber were not to be the subject of negotiations with foreign countries. These excise taxes differ from a tariff or customs duty and were given special treatment because the excise taxes, as a part of the revenue law, are reviewed periodically by Congress. The record clearly shows that Congress intended to retain full control over these excise taxes. The Ways and Means Committee of the Seventy-third Congress in its report on the pending trade agreements bill said:

In order that the necessary reciprocity may be accorded, the President is empowered to promise that existing duties which affect imported goods will not be increased during the term of any particular agreement. It should be carefully noted, however, that the President is given no right to reduce or increase any excise duty. His power of reduction of duties is limited to those which are in fact customs duties.

The Senate Committee on Finance adopted the Ways and Means Committee report, including the above language.

In addition, Senator Harrison, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, on May 17, 1934, in presenting the bill to the Senate called specific attention to excise taxes and their position with respect to the trade agreements authority, saying:

It was the intent of those who framed the legislation, and of the House in passing the bill, that they would be frozen; in other words they might not be modified. * * * They cannot be increased and they cannot be lowered.

This intent and understanding on the part of Congress was further evidenced a few years later when in 1939 it was proposed that the excise tax on copper would be the subject of negotiation in an agreement with Chile. At that time Senators HAYDEN and Ashurst, of Arizona, filed a brief with the State Department in protest of the proposed consideration to reduce the excise tax on copper. They said, in referring to the excise taxes:

For the executive branch of the Government to reduce them, by negotiation with a foreign government, would constitute a serious and substantial breach of faith with the Congress.

In the bill I have introduced I propose that the import tax shall apply on imported oil that is used as supplies for vessels at United States ports. Under the Internal Revenue Code imports for vessel supplies are exempted from the import tax. Such imports during the past year have averaged from 60,000 to 75,000 barrels per day. The supplies for vessels at United States ports are a part of the domestic market. It is in our national interest that the domestic industry be able to supply these requirements at all times. It is important that this portion of our needs does not become dependent upon an uncertain source of supply. A tax on these imports will also provide a substantial source of revenue. In line with past practice, my bill further provides that imports for manufacture and reexport are not subject to the tax.

Mr. Speaker, the world now produces a surplus of crude petroleum and its derivatives. Much of the foreign production which we now find so competitive with our domestic production has been financed by American money. Imports which have now risen to the staggering amount of 750,000 barrels per day are still rising and will doubtless soon reach the amount of a million barrels per day. This tremendous flow of relatively untaxed, unregulated foreign oil should contribute not less than $300,000,000 a year to our needy Treasury. Not only this, but our American labor and our American industries are entitled to the small degree of protection which this bill would afford.

Notwithstanding some statements to the contrary, we in this country now produce and will continue to produce a surplus of crude petroleum and the derivatives of crude petroleum. We are a surplus producer of these commodities. Not only that, but vast new fields have been discovered throughout the world, and the world is now a surplus producer of crude petroleum and the derivatives thereof.

In the Middle East, largely by American companies, fabulous new oil reserves have been discovered, and vast production is now occurring in that area. American companies, too, have developed great fields in Venezuela and vast new supplies have been discovered in Canada. In 1936 we were a net exporter of crude petroleum and crude-petroleum products in the net amount of approximately 200,000 barrels per day. Now, get this picture. From a net exporter of this surplus commodity, one that we produce in surplus here in our domestic economy, we have now become a net importer of this same commodity in the amount of around 300,000 barrels per day.

Now, what has been the effect of these tremendous imports of foreign crude oil and the derivatives thereof? In my own State of Texas which, as you gentlemen know, is an oil-producing State, our allowables, that is the amount of crude oil we are permitted to produce, have been reduced by the railroad commission, the conservation agency of our State, by approximately the same amount as our imports. Within the last year the State of Texas has suffered in tax-revenue loss alone more than $30,000,000 because of this reduced production of crude oil and the derivatives of crude oil.

The Texas Legislature is convening this month to levy new taxes in our State to take up the slack as the result of the loss of revenue because of curtailed oil production, production which we have been compelled to reduce largely because of imported foreign crude oil. Through ECA, through loans, and through other methods, we have subsidized to a large extent the exploration and development, in these foreign areas of the world, of these vast supplies of crude oil, therefore it seems to me that a sense of fairness and of equity to the American taxpayer alone ought to cause us to give serious consideration to increasing the excise tax on crude petroleum and the derivatives of crude petroleum.

Now we are faced with a situation where domestic labor is being forced into idleness. Refineries are being closed. Independents in the industry are going broke. Businesses allied with them are suffering. The situation grows worse instead of better. Importation of foreign oil will probably soon rise to a million barrels per day or more.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSSETT. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I do not understand just what the gentleman is telling us here. Does he mean that if we had a higher excise tax on petroleum and crude products that would increase the supply of oil?

Mr. GOSSETT. No; I say we have a surplus of oil, and our domestic oil is being supplanted by foreign oil which comes in relatively tax-free. I say that domestic labor and domestic industry is entitled to some protection against utter destruction from foreign competition.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. What the gentleman proposes is to increase the tax on the oil that comes in or on the domestic oil?

Mr. GOSSETT. No; I propose to increase the tax on imported crude oil and the derivatives thereof. I want to bring the tax up to around a dollar a barrel. It will have no effect on the supplies, except that it will mean that our domestic producers can supply the domestic demand rather than having this foreign oil brought in for the domestic market.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Then it is not a tax on domestic oil?

Mr. GOSSETT. No.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSSETT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. I am glad to see the gentleman come in here and talk for tariffs on products coming into this country. It is a real joy to me to see that coming from that side of the House, because of the fact that you have given the President and the State Department now under the reciprocal-trade-agreements program the right and the power to cut down these tariffs.

This removal of all duties on imports is wrong because eventually you will be putting our working people out of their jobs and you will have our industry closed down. It is high time that somebody on that side began to see that. I take my hat off to you, sir, and I hope you will get many more Members on that side to do something because if you do not you will find that labor in this country will be out of luck. They will not have a job and the industries will be closed down and out of business.

Mr. GOSSETT. I thank the gentleman. I might say to the gentleman that thousands of workers are already out of jobs because of this foreign oil coming into this country in an ever-increasing flood.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSSETT. I yield.

Mr. GAVIN. Would the gentleman care to discuss the ECA situation whereby we are making loans or grants to foreign refineries which will be in competition with our own export business?

Mr. GOSSETT. I do not have all of the data before me, but I do know that ECA money is being used in some degree, at least, to build refineries abroad and to develop production by foreign countries. The British have recently declared their intention to quit using dollars in the purchase of oil and they are closing the British market, or at least threatening to close it in substantial degree to American oil.

In other words here is a world market which we have had some part in heretofore and now we are not only losing our world markets in crude petroleum, but foreign oil is coming in from all over the world and supplanting our domestic supply to a dangerous degree.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PRIEST). The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to proceed for three additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAVIN. Then, in other words, along with the importation of crude oil, which is working a hardship on the petroleum industry and the independent producers, we are asking these independent producers in the petroleum industry to furnish the money, through taxes, which go to the Government and then the ECA is developing these refinery programs abroad which will bring about competition for our independent producers here? In other words they are furnishing the money to sharpen the razor that is cutting their economic throat; is that not right?

Mr. GOSSETT. To a certain degree. The small independent producer in this country in effect is helping to finance their own destruction so far as foreign competition goes. This tax that I am proposing would be to some degree an equalization tax.

Mr. GAVIN. That is right. I quite agree. The gentleman has made a very fine statement. Could the gentleman tell us approximately how many barrels of oil are being imported into this country monthly, or daily?

Mr. GOSSETT. Roughly 750,000 barrels per day. We are told by the major importers, who are quite frank and honest about it that that figure is going up. The State Department has estimated that importations will increase and I make the prediction that within the next few months we will be getting into this country 1,000,000 barrels per day of crude oil from foreign fields.

Mr. GAVIN. What was it last year at this time?

Mr. GOSSETT. The gentleman means in 1948?

Mr. GAVIN. Yes.

Mr. GOSSETT. I believe it was around 500,000 barrels a day, or even less.

Mr. GAVIN. And it is rapidly increasing?

Mr. GOSSETT. The import curve is going up rapidly.

Mr. GAVIN. And the market for the independent producers is going down because they cannot find a market for their oil and refineries are being closed down; is that not correct?

Mr. GOSSETT. Refineries are being closed by the dozen. Research is being slowed and exploration is being curtailed. Nobody with any information on this subject at all in this country has any idea that we are running out of oil. We have tremendous known reserves which are not being drilled. The independents, your wildcatters in the industry, have quit looking for oil to a large extent because it is not profitable any longer.

Another thing we should remember is if we get into a war, my dear sir, we are going to have to depend on our domestic supplies for our own domestic economy.

We are being shortsighted in the interests of our own national defense when we destroy or seriously impair so vital a domestic industry.

Mr. GAVIN. Unless we permit these independents to live, we cannot build up our reserves so that in the event we are catapulted into a cataclysm of war we are going to find ourselves in difficulties unless we have these reserves of oil; is that not correct?

Mr. GOSSETT. The gentleman is exactly right. I thank him for his contribution.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSSETT. I yield.

Mr. KEEFE. From the gentleman's statement I understand that what he is complaining about is the importation of foreign oil with little or no tax on it and the fact that this oil, which is cheaply produced is being dumped on our American market to the detriment of the independent oil producers in our own country. Is that right?

Mr. GOSSETT. That is quite right, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PRIEST). Permit the Chair to state there are other special orders. However, the Chair will put the request.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GOSSETT] is recognized for an additional 5 minutes.

Mr. KEEFE. The gentleman has made his plea, as I understand it, in behalf of the independent producers of oil?

Mr. GOSSETT. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. The large oil companies are in the foreign field, are they not?

Mr. GOSSETT. There are about 11 of them that constitute the majors of the industry in this country. They are the chief importers. They also have most of these reserves in foreign fields.

Mr. KEEFE. They are either actual American corporations or subsidiaries of American corporations that have developed oil in foreign countries which they are bringing into this country in competition with the independent producers in America? Is that right?

Mr. GOSSETT. That is 95 percent correct; yes, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. What the gentleman proposes to do, as I understand it, is to levy a tax upon that oil that comes into this country from foreign countries? Is that right?

Mr. GOSSETT. That is exactly right.

Mr. KEEFE. That is a tariff, is it not? Call it what you want to.

Mr. GOSSETT. It might be called a tariff, but in the revenue code it is called an excise tax. There is a distinction.

Mr. KEEFE. It does not make any difference what you call it, the result is the same. You are seeking protection for the independent oil producer against the importation of cheaply produced oil, produced in foreign countries? Is that not what you are asking?

Mr. GOSSETT. That is part of it. There are many reasons. First, is protection. Second, is revenue. Third, is to keep the domestic industry on its feet against the day when we probably would need it. Another is the over-all benefit to our entire domestic economy.

Mr. KEEFE. Let me ask the gentleman: What you are asking, therefore, is the old theory of tariff for revenue, as distinguished against a purely protective tariff?

Mr. GOSSETT. Well, is the gentleman for it or against it?

Mr. KEEFE. I am not being interrogated.

Mr. GOSSETT. I am not a tariff expert. I do not want to make a speech on the tariff just here.

Mr. KEEFE. I will say this to the gentleman, that what I am interested in, and I think the problem is becoming very, very acute right now, and you do not need to limit it to oil. You can apply it to a half dozen industries. For instance, in my own district, one of them, notably the domestic fur industry, which has been put out of business by cheaper products coming in under the reciprocal trade-agreements program, free, or practically free of any tax or tariff protection. So I am interested, in answer to the gentleman's question to me, in seeing to it if we can develop a system in this country that will protect your industry and protect my industry, so that labor will have a chance to work in this country and these people who were so optimistic in the past, talking about the wonders and the glories of free trade, are just now beginning to awaken and become alive to the fact that apparently it is a one-way street, as far as it affects America.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSSETT. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. LUCAS. I think the gentleman is to be commended for his statement with reference to the protection for the domestic producers of oil. I think the gentleman might well describe to the House the effect that has resulted from the high importation of oil, on our small producers and on our independent producers, in that they are not continuing their exploration of the oil fields, and they are fast going into the hands of the large producers, creating a greater and greater monopoly in the oil production.

Mr. GOSSETT. That is a very fine point, and I thank my colleague.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSSETT. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BECKWORTH. I want to commend the gentleman for the statement he has made, and to say that the last meeting I attended in my district before returning here was with the free and independent producers from the east Texas oil fields in Texas. I sincerely think that the State Department is not considering the plight of this industry as carefully as it should. I thought that so strongly that when I returned here, the first contact I made with any department was to get in touch with the Secretary of State and describe to him as best I could that which had been told me by these independent producers.

Mr. GOSSETT. I know the gentleman has been working hard on this problem.

Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSSETT. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. TEAGUE. The remark was just made that the best way to conserve oil is to keep it in the ground. Is that entirely true?

Mr. GOSSETT. That is not true. There are 8,000,000,000 barrels of known reserves that are produced in stripper wells. When you let a cow go dry, you do not start milking her again the next day. When you let these wells go dry, you have lost that oil forever. These are the first wells to be retired, to go out of production when this competition comes in, and they are now being abandoned by the thousands.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended five additional minutes.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not, I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended five additional minutes; is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. GOSSETT. I now yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. REES. I merely wish to commend the gentleman for his effort in dealing with this problem. I hope that he may be able to secure a majority of this House to support his proposal. The gentleman well knows that I have done some work on this question myself, and I could very well join with him in extending my remarks and telling him about the work I have done.

Mr. GOSSETT. I know the gentleman from Kansas has introduced a bill to place a quota on imported crude oil and that he has done a great deal of studying on this problem. His State is being injured by excessive importation of crude oil.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GOSSETT. I yield.

Mr. RICH. I hope the gentleman will go further than oil in the work he is trying to do. I had a letter from a concern in Pittsburgh that manufactures tool steel, the writer stating that because of imports of tool steel into this country he is unable to keep his plant going, and he asked: "Can you not do something about getting an excise tax or a tariff on imported tool steel?"

I said "No," that I could not help him at all, because I had no influence whatever with the administration, that he would have to call in his labor leaders and tell them that they would be out of jobs, and get them to go down to see Mr. Truman if he wanted to get any results. I think that is the only way in the world that these manufacturers are going to get any relief, to make labor realize that their men will be out of jobs if this importation is not stopped.

Mr. GAVIN. If the gentleman will yield, Mr. Speaker, I might state that the concern the gentleman from Pennsylvania is talking about is a Pittsburgh steel industry. The basic wage rate for steelworkers in the United States is $1.65; in Canada it is 97 cents; in Sweden it is 37 cents. Under the reciprocal trade treaties Canada reduced the price to 13½ cents. The price in this country is 15 cents. Canada gets this preference, a country that has balanced its budget, and that last year, I understand, had a surplus of $90,000,000. We still have an unbalanced budget and are still following this policy of breaking down the industrial and economic life of our country. As the gentleman said, labor should investigate these conditions. They certainly have something to think about in the steel industry.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSSETT. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen are going to have a chance to declare themselves on excise taxes. They are either for them or against them. I have always been opposed to excise taxes; I am going to be opposed to this excise tax. They can say what they want despite the fact there is a lot of backslapping between representatives of the coal States and representatives of the oil States. Where do you come in now in defense of your tourists who were short of gasoline and were rationed and denied gasoline in and around Chicago, Detroit, and the great tourist State of Pennsylvania? What are you going to do for your tourists, for your automobile gasoline user? Do you want to up the price of gasoline? It is too high now.

Mr. GOSSETT. There is no shortage of gasoline; there has been no shortage of gasoline; there will be no shortage of gasoline.

Mr. DINGELL. There was last summer.

Mr. GOSSETT. If there was, then it was due to some transportation difficulty, not to any inadequacy of supplies, because storage is full of gasoline. Many gasoline refineries are being closed.

I now yield to my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEOGH], who has done a lot of work on this problem as a member of the Small Business Committee.

Mr. KEOGH. It has been suggested in some quarters that the reduction of the allowable production in such producing States as Texas, and the effort to impose restrictions on the imports of petroleum and petroleum products have for their objective the maintenance of an abnormally high price structure in centers like the metropolitan area of New York.

Mr. GOSSETT. This question does not involve price structure at all, because the price has not been reduced and will not be reduced on account of imports. I am not an expert on price, I may say to the gentleman from New York, but let me say that the prices of crude oil and crude-oil products are considerably below parity when measured by the commodity index of the Department of Labor. If the independents of the oil industry are destroyed, prices will rise, not fall.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BREHM asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PRIEST). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] is recognized for 20 minutes.

THE PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to represent an oil field that produces a finer grade of crude oil than any other district in the United States.

The quality of this crude oil produced in Allegany County, N. Y., has no superior.

The excellence of its lubricating quality was so recognized by the experts in the aviation field.

I want to protect the operators, the employees, and our consumers from the devastating consequences of the present policy of opening our domestic markets to foreign oil.

The petroleum industry of the United States is today beginning to reap a weedy crop of sale cancellations, order losses, and unemployment slips. The seeds were thoughtlessly sown many months ago by internationalists who, in the name of rehabilitation and aid to foreign countries, laid the plans for closing foreign markets to our own oil and opening our own markets to foreign oil.

In this connection I quote from the New York Times of Friday, January 13, 1950:

TOKYO, January 12.—American oil interests are rapidly being squeezed out of the Japanese market. Businessmen say the experience here parallels that elsewhere and that markets everywhere are being closed to them as the British effectively enlarge the sterling bloc by bilateral agreements.

The article goes on as follows:

Businessmen say there already are signs that the British who have acquired complete cartel control through American acquiescence, are beginning to raise prices far above normal competitive levels and to supply inferior products such as sulfur and heavy crude oil.

I want you to note carefully the next paragraph:

Occupation officials decline to accept any responsibility for this policy, asserting that it comes direct from Washington.

Now the representatives of oil-producing areas know who is taking such good care of your businessmen and workers.

The oil industry today could be producing efficiently and according to strictest conservation practices about 1,000,000 more barrels of oil every day than are now allowed. Although new wells are continually being discovered, production is already over 600,000 barrels per day less than it was a year ago. In the fourth quarter of 1948 output was 5,660,000 barrels per day. In the fourth quarter of 1949, estimating the last 3 or 4 weeks to be similar to that of the first 2 months of the quarter, production was about 5,000,000 per day. The unlucky workers who formerly produced that amount are now without jobs.

What has caused this? Simply the horse trading and finagling of our Government officials who, in the name of balancing our trade, justify any extreme.

Imports of petroleum in 1948 averaged 513,000 barrels per day. Imports in the first 10 months of 1949 averaged 634,000 barrels per day, an increase of over 23 percent. Imports in January 1949 amounted to 654,000 barrels per day, and in October they had risen to 785,000 per day. In the fourth quarter of 1948 imports were about 586,000 barrels per day—in the same period of 1949 they were about 750,000 per day.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the worst. Recent testimony before the Small Business Committee by oil importers indicate definite plans for imports during the first half of 1950 of at least 800,000 barrels per day, and if that does not spell additional unemployment in our own industry my education has been faulty.

Are our exports of oil to take up the slack? Hardly a week passes that we do not read of some foreign market for our oil products being closed to us or taken over by some foreign power through judicious use of the ECA money we have granted them.

In 1947 our exports of oil averaged 451,000 barrels per day. This had declined to 369,000 barrels by 1948, the average for that year. As sale after sale and market after market was lost through the bilateral and State-trading deals negotiated by Government heads and sanctioned or condoned by our own Government leaders the export business became poorer and poorer. In January of 1949 we exported only an average of 311,000 barrels per day, and the steady decline continued, for in September of last year exports were only 251,000 barrels per day.

I do not need to remind the unemployed oil worker of this, but perhaps some of my listeners do not know, we, by State or Government action, force the producers in this country to curtail output. Will someone kindly inform me by what law of justice we place no curb on imports, but on the contrary continue to increase them?

The independent oil producers, the principal ones to suffer when exports are shut off and imports greatly increased, will be interested to know of the devious and back-handed methods used to undermine them. I call their attention to a very curious procedure that is in the process of development.

The impotency of Congress under its present leadership is openly recognized by prominent Government administrators and other public servants. The elected representatives of the people are charged with the solemn obligation to formulate the policies of this Government, both foreign and domestic. We have had no foreign policy for many years—the White House has vacillated, experimented, and ignored the need for a sound program. Attempts of Congress, as feeble as they have been, have constantly been thwarted by the President.

Now plans are being pushed to name a committee of private citizens to formulate United States policy toward current world economic problems—see New York Times, December 13, 1949. ECA officials especially are urging that such a group be formed to take over what Senate and House leaders of the majority have not done or allowed to be done. It appears that Paul G. Hoffman, ECA Administrator, has discussed the formation of this committee with Dean Acheson, Secretary of State, and that, while most of the effort is being made by ECA, the State Department agrees with the idea.

This so-called Citizens' Committee would take over Congress' job on major problems arising from the economic imbalance among various sections of the world. The closing of the dollar gap between United States exports and imports would likely receive first attention. This would be a real undertaking, as witness the fact that all the King's men—Presidential advisers—and all the King's horses—American taxpayers—have not been able to put it together. Imports in the first 9 months of 1948 were 55 percent as large as exports—in 1949, during the same period of the year, they were only 52 percent of exports. All the haphazard pushing and pulling seems to have done Mr. Humpty Dumpty more harm than good—as was to be expected when so much of the effort was aimed at artificially stimulating exports for the benefit of big business.

The Citizens' Committee or Little Congress or Policy Makers, Inc., or this group by whatever name, just may turn out to be hand-picked and packed with pro "export at any cost" citizens. The ECA is taking the initiative and may be expected to do a conscientious job, but the Departments of State and Treasury will be playing equal hands in the game. The proclivity of the State Department for "picking and packing"—picking the right kind of people and packing of the right committees—is well known. Inasmuch as the future of the petroleum and a good many other domestic industries will be at stake in this chessboard juggling to keep double imports, someone should examine very carefully the citizens who are to be handed this most important policy-making job.

The role of Congress in this molding of the future of our country will be minor at best. It is possible that some enabling legislation will be steam-rollered through to give the President power to put into effect the desires and recommendations of the substitute legislators on the committee. After all, the Constitution is quite specific about the powers and duties of Congress, and if the executive wants to continue to usurp the functions of Senators and Representatives it will have to be by even greater delegations of power.

Regardless of the sincerity or nonpartisan attitude of the committee members, and their education, experience, and ability notwithstanding, the formulation of our foreign policies was delegated to duly elected representatives of the people by the founding fathers, and no biased administration leaders should undermine or attempt to destroy that function. If Congress refuses to act, or if waste and inefficiency and negligence has left us with only a smelly remnant of a foreign policy, then the voters of this country should and will rise up to do something about it. It is and will always be the duty of Congress to pass on our trade policies, and no administration appointees should be empowered to manipulate foreign trade or domestic production or to shift manpower from free-enterprise industries to huge exporting combines.

The crux of it all is that the passage of a few highly controversial bills by very narrow margins during the last session have been literally interpreted by certain individuals as a mandate to revise the labor, management, and production structure of the entire country; to shift manpower, to close some industries and expand others, and to dictate whether we should consume goods made in America or pamper the foreign "leaders" exploiting state-controlled, low-paid labor.

The buying of American goods, produced from domestic raw materials by American labor, is actually being attacked as unpatriotic and is constantly being discouraged by speeches, publications, and various sorts of propaganda put out by hand-picked bureaucrats and financed by the taxpayers. Trade with iron-curtain countries, through deals with political leaders who control output, sale, price, and markets, is being pushed vigorously by our own leaders. Export controls have limited shipments of some types of goods to Russia, but we apparently welcome with open arms the goods they want to ship to us, including enormous amounts of furs which have literally devastated our own industry. In 1948—now mark this—in 1948 we imported from Russia almost three times as much as we exported to that country. Common sense tells us that we are building up a war potential in that country and her satellites just as much through importing from them as we do by exporting to them.

In 1948 we exported to iron-curtain countries goods valued at about $165,000,000 and imported goods from them in the sum of almost $150,000,000. Let the man walking the street hunting for work understand that—and ask him if he favors such a huge volume of trade with the Communists. Our enormous budget and high taxes are, according to the President, the result of preparations for defense against communism—and so we pamper it and foster it by importing huge quantities of highly competitive goods produced in Communist slave-labor camps.

State trading, in Russia and many other countries, is rapidly setting a pattern for future world exchange of goods and our own diplomats are fostering the idea by urging the adoption of an International Trade Organization, which, while it shakes a finger at such practices in its preamble, proceeds to legalize and recognize such deals in its later chapters.

It takes no expert forecaster to prognosticate that this new citizens committee will follow instructions from someone. There is a citizens committee for the promotion of this International Trade Organization. This proposed new one will also likely do much less analyzing and studying than it will do by way of promotion. This idea that we must buy foreign goods instead of our own is not meeting with too good a reception, and apparently the public must be bamboozled more than the bureaucrats have been able to do by themselves.

I cannot but wonder how the farmer will be represented on such a committee. The administration, and the State Department have openly and frequently broken the promises of President Roosevelt that duties on agricultural products would not be reduced.

Very much the opposite has taken place. Here is some really astounding information. The full impact of the last trade agreements, those negotiated at Annecy, France, a year ago, fell right on the farmer. The administration has been careful not to advertise the fact, but look at these figures—and they are easily proved—almost 84 percent of the reductions in duties at the Annecy horse-trading session were on agricultural products. Only about 16 percent of the value of imported articles affected would not be classed as farm-income products. Butter was one of those items—and who is there to say that our own Department of Agriculture was not right in overruling the State Department by refusing to issue import licenses when we have a huge surplus in our own country. Who is to say that peace and good will have been promoted with Denmark and New Zealand and Norway, and several other countries by making promises that even our most ignorant negotiators knew we might not be able to keep.

The farmer begins to see the handwriting on the wall. He knows that the pap of temporary price supports and Government purchases of his products is not solid nor nourishing. He is rapidly becoming aware that he is losing his export markets, and he is also learning fast that agriculture is taking the brunt of the tariff cuts that drive his products out of his own home market. The farmers' reaction of disgust to the Brannan plan of socializing the industry which brings life and plenty from the soil is a good indication. Our farmers, our developers of new products such as tung oil and rice and other items that formerly could be obtained only in far-away places, will not be misled by any committee set up to extol the virtues of abandoning their farms and their projects so the public will be forced to buy food from abroad.

I, and most of the agriculturists, and most businessmen want to see and promote the largest possible volume of profitable foreign trade. The efforts of any one-world group promoting excessive imports, however, will meet some strong opposition.

About three-fourths of the oil-producing wells in the United States are in the stripper class. Natural decline ultimately makes strippers of all wells. In recent years, with the betterment of conservation practices, the stripper-well stage is delayed, but there still are in excess of 300,000 such wells.

A stripper well has two principal characteristics. First, it is capable of only small natural production (most of them are pumped); and, second, it is always in the lowest profit zone. It is, therefore, the one most vulnerable to the raids of low-cost foreign oil.

Stripper wells normally account for 13 to 15 percent of the annual production of crude oil in the United States. Important as that is—the importance was especially noticed during the war—it is of equal or even greater importance that stripper well reserves operated under secondary recovery methods are very large.

On many properties where water has been systemically injected into the producing sand there has been a recovery of oil greater than the total recovered over a long period of primary methods.

Estimates are that billions of barrels of oil are recoverable by restoring pressure in the sands with water, natural gas, or compressed air.

The probability that secondary recovery work will be done is greatly lessened when stripper-well properties are abandoned or forced to discontinue daily operation. Yet, under the weight of huge imports of oil, the stripper reserves would be junked first. Purchasers of domestic crude oil, in the effort to reduce costs, would seek their supplies in the fields of greater volume where gathering costs in the field were lowest. They are highest in the stripper-well fields.

Repeatedly, certain elements in the executive department of government have given all possible support to foreign oil development and importation into the United States. Two recommendations illustrate this attitude:

First. On July 27, 1943, the Special Committee on Petroleum, an interdepartmental group set up by the State Department, held a meeting. Attending were Herbert Feis, Alger Hiss, and J. C. Sappington, of the State Department; Commodore A. F. Carter, Navy Department; Brig. Gen. Boykin C. Wright, War Department; C. S. Snodgrass and E. L. DeGolyer, Petroleum Administration for War. It was the declared purpose to "facilitate entry into the United States of foreign oil by reducing import restrictions." It was also stated in the minutes of the meeting—see Senate Report No. 440, part 5, Eightieth Congress, page 49—that Government policy should be to "encourage through financial and other appropriate governmental assistance the development of foreign oil supplies." This committee's existence, it had earlier been declared, was not related to the war effort, but was to assure postwar supplies of oil. What makes our domestic market so attractive to oil importers? The answer is plain.

Approximately four-fifths of the automobiles, busses, and trucks in the world are owned and operated in the United States.

Latest figures on world registration of motor vehicles indicated the following population ratios per vehicles: Europe, 1 to 61 persons; Asia, 1 to 1,804; all North and South America, including the United States, 1 to 75; United States 1 to 4.

More homes are heated with oil in the United States than in all the rest of the world; more industries consume fuel oil.

Distribution facilities are the best and the most numerous. There are about 400,000 retail outlets for the sale of gasoline.

Importers are in a hurry to find big markets for their foreign production. The largest, most accessible and most readily served market in the world is in the United States. Further development of foreign markets is slow and costly.

Second. In August 1948 the National Security Resources Board circulated privately a report recommending a reduction of 20 percent in domestic production to create a reserve producing capacity for emergency use. Any deficit in supply, resulting from such reduction, it was stated, should be made up by imports. The recommended reduction would, as of the producing rate at that time, equal about 1,100,000 barrels daily. Through cut-backs in State allowable production and increases in new production created by drilling, the goal set in the report has been approximated.

These recommendations of policy by agencies of the executive branch of government are in opposition to the expansion of the domestic industry sufficient to meet both peacetime and emergency requirements.

I wish at this point to present the history of oil-import tax and application of trade-agreements program.

In 1932 Congress recognized the problems confronting the domestic oil industry resulting from a rising flood of imports, and at that time established excise taxes on the importation of crude petroleum and all petroleum products. The problem facing the industry today closely parallels the situation existing in 1932.

The excise taxes established in 1932 on the principal petroleum products were as follows:

		Cents
Crude	barrel	21
Fuel oil	do	21
Gasoline	do	2½
Kerosene	do	½
Lubricating oil	do	4

The action of Congress in 1932 was in effect an announced policy of encouragement to the domestic industry by preventing injury that might result from imports of foreign oil. The amount of the tax was not so important as the assurance that the congressional policy gave to the domestic industry, which was encouraged to proceed in its normal way in developing the petroleum resources of the Nation. The result was that the industry had built up a reserve producing capacity of approximately 1,000,000 barrels daily above requirements by the beginning of World War II. This supply was readily available in case of emergency, and not subject to interruption by enemy submarines.

The petroleum excise taxes have been the subject of treatment under the trade-agreements program on three occasions. First, in 1939, in the agreement with Venezuela. Second, in 1943 in the agreement with Mexico. Third, in 1947 in the multilateral agreement consummated in Geneva.

In the Venezuela agreement the excise tax was reduced from 21 cents to 10½ cents per barrel on the following: First, crude petroleum; second, topped crude petroleum; third, gas oil; and, fourth, fuel oil. These reduced taxes, however, applied only to a quota based on 5 percent of the total quantity processed in United States refineries. All imports in excess of the quota were subject to the full tax.

In the Mexico agreement the quota restriction of the Venezuela agreement was removed, the reduced rates of the Venezuela agreement were reaffirmed, and, in addition, the tax was reduced 50 percent on the following: First, kerosene; second, liquid asphalt; and, third, road oil.

In the general agreement on tariffs and trade of 1947, concluded at Geneva, the tax on gasoline was reduced from 2½ cents to 1¼ cents and on lubricating oils from 4 cents to 2 cents. All other products not treated in previous agreements also were reduced by 50 percent.

Thus the status of the petroleum-import taxes which Congress provided in 1932 is that all petroleum excises have been reduced by 50 percent. Through this action the executive branch of the Federal Government has reversed the congressional policy of encouragement of the domestic industry to one of favoring oil development in foreign countries.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] is recognized for 15 minutes.

THE NATIONAL DEBT

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, be nifty and thrifty in fifty.

I want to impress that on the minds of all Members of Congress, if this country is to survive. We have reached the high-water mark of squandering and spending and taxing. From now on we are either going to have a hard time to work ourselves out of the condition in which we find ourselves or else we are going to sink. Too much expensive, overburdened government, and taxes. It is going to take the best minds we have, and use of the best common sense that we have to do the things that are for the best interests of the Nation. We have to forget a lot of things that we are doing, cut out a lot of burdensome government, if we are going to survive.

When the time comes that we follow a party blindly because the head of the party says we ought to follow that road to bankruptcy, you are only heading for bankruptcy, unless you get the head of the party to change his course. Get common sense and have a common-sense program.

I take the Federal budget, in brief, that was handed to me, and which was read before the Members of Congress during the past 2 weeks, and I find that the President has asked you to spend this year $42,400,000,000 when he says, by the best experts that he has in Government, that he is going to receive only $37,300,000,000. He is advocating spending $5,100,000,000 more than he expects to take in. Ever since he has been President he has been doing that very thing. He has been advocating spending money without trying to keep the country solvent. It is not going to work. It is a wreck ahead. That is what he did in the haberdashery business.

If you will take the years back, for the last 15 years, just see what has happened to this country. We have increased our national debt from $20,000,000,000 since 1932 until today we have a debt of $269,000,000,000. It was not all war by any sense; it has been foolish, ridiculous, unsound administration and laws by an irresponsible people and Congress and a President who led you into this terrible mess and is still at it.

Here are the great items of expenditure: National defense, $13,500,000,000; veterans, $6,100,000,000; interest on the public debt, $5,600,000,000, and the ECA or the international fund that we are spending, or providing, is $4,700,000,000. In 1949 on this ECA we spent $5,876,000,000; in 1950, the current fiscal year, the amount is $5,364,000,000; and the President has requested for next year $4,700,000,000. This is the principal thing about which I wish to talk today. When we know the condition of our country and we know just what the results are going to be if we go into bankruptcy, it ought to be our duty to look after America first, last, and all the time. It is not that I do not want to try to help some foreign country or someone else get on their feet, but when it goes to the extent of breaking down this country, America, then I am against it. I would like to see the Members of this Congress, the men here who were responsible for spending all this money in the last few years go back to their people and let them vote on the proposition whether they want you to give away without their consent to some foreign country $45 for every man, woman, and child in your district in 1 year to foreign countries. I just do not believe they want you to do it; I know they do not in my district. I find a few of them who say that we ought to help these foreign countries, but when I ask them for their $45 they do not shell out. They do not have anything to shell out; they want somebody else to do it, for they are not willing to. They are taxed too much now. And that is a point I wish to make, that it is easy to talk and nice to say all these things about these foreign countries, but it is quite a different matter when it comes to placing more taxes on the back of the people of your district, because they are the ones that have got to pay the bill and that is the only way in which you can get the money to pay the bill; tax, tax, and tax, they just do not do it voluntarily.

I was very much interested in reading an editorial in this morning's Times-Herald in which Britain asks us to pay her debts. I think it would be a good thing if each Member here read it, and I shall insert it in the RECORD at this point:

BRITAIN ASKS US TO PAY HER DEBTS

Another move for aid to Britain at the expense of the American taxpayer is being promoted. With encouragement from some of the more extreme Anglophiles here, Stafford Cripps in London last Monday called for an early meeting with Secretary of the Treasury Snyder on Britain's dollar-shortage problem.

What Cripps wants help on this time is the sterling balances, Britain's war debt to India, Egypt, Pakistan, Eire, Ceylon, and other countries in the sterling bloc.

At the end of the war Britain owed these countries £3,700,000,000 sterling. The debt was not in the form of bonds, but consisted of balances at London banks in the accounts of the creditors. At the rate of $4.03 per pound, the sterling debt amounted to nearly $15,000,000,000.

While Britain owed the sterling countries $15,000,000,000, she owed the United States $30,000,000,000 under lend-lease. Forty-five billions was quite a burden for the British. The United States came to Britain's aid at this juncture by canceling the $30,000,000,000 debt.

In the expectation that Britain would make a deal with her sterling creditors extending most of the debt for payment over a long period of time and making a small amount available for current drawings, the United States made a cash loan of $3,750,000,000 to Britain at a nominal rate of interest, with no payments for 5 years, and payments excused in years of financial strain.

At the same time, Britain was given title to lend-lease goods which were in the pipe lines but not delivered. These goods, worth $650,000,000, were to be paid for on the same terms as the $3,750,000,000 debt.

STERLING CREDITORS REFUSE TO CONCEDE

But the sterling creditors, who would have been compelled to go along on a composition settlement had we not canceled lend-lease and granted the $3,750,000,000 credit, have since refused to make any material concessions. Cripps and his predecessor have made annual deals with these countries, limiting the amount that could be withdrawn and fixing an annual interest rate of one-half of 1 percent.

But the countries have been using the amounts released under these annual agreements to pay for a substantial portion of the goods Britain was prepared to export. Actually, the Labor government has been unable to hold the withdrawals down to the amounts agreed upon. Much of the goods made in Britain has gone out of the country without offsetting imports coming back.

The goods Britain has shipped to pay off the war debt to these preferred creditors reduced the amount that could be shipped to the United States and sold for dollars. And as a result, there is a dollar shortage.

* * * * *

To correct this situation, Britain now asks that the United States assume the British debt to the sterling countries. It is said this is in our own interest and it will "establish a wide market for American exports." We shall be shipping the "unrequited exports" instead of Britain. By assuming a debt that is busting Britain, we are to get rich.

The London Times asserted a short time ago that "the American taxpayer is bound to finance eventually a large portion of the export surplus anyhow," and "free exports to India may be regarded as good a way of giving away money as any of the ways practiced in recent years."

UNITED STATES URGED TO AID STERLING SETTLEMENT

The advocates of shifting of the sterling debt to the shoulders of the American taxpayers are not all British. A committee of the United States council of the International Chamber of Commerce only last month brought out the idea of the United States contributing 15 percent toward the settlement of the sterling balances.

That isn't the only way to wipe out the sterling debt. By payments in unrequited exports Britain got the debt down from £3,700,000,000 at the end of 1946 to £3,200,000,000 by September. That is from $15,000,000,000 down to $12,800,000,000. It stood there on Saturday night, September 17. The next day the debt was down to $8,960,000,000. It was reduced $4,000,000,000 by devaluing the pound from $4.03 down to $2.80.

The sterling-debt countries have seen how their money can get away fast. The threat of wiping out more of it the same way should bring them to time. But that is Britain's problem, not ours. Congress should make it clear that it isn't going to unload the sterling debt on the United States. Now is the time to tell Cripps that that is all there is, there isn't any more.

I wish to comment on this editorial a little. I have no objection to Great Britain; my ancestors came from Great Britain before the Revolution, and my people have been here all these years. I am proud of my English blood, but I am not proud of the fact that I am asked to sink America to save England. I do not think we ought to do it. Sir Stafford Cripps is coming over here now to talk again to Mr. Snyder—and just remember that Mr. Snyder and Mr. Acheson and Mr. Truman are the fellows who are recommending all this money to save these foreign countries.

Last year the President asked for $5,364,000,000—that is five thousand three hundred and sixty-four millions of dollars—think of it, five thousand three hundred and sixty-four millions—that is a lot of money. Where are you going to get the money? Are we now going to try to pay the debts that England owes to her own Commonwealth countries? For instance, to India, to Egypt, to Pakistan, to Ireland, to Ceylon, and to other countries in the sterling bloc? What obligation have we to pay the debts of Great Britain? I say none at all. Why do we not pay our own debts? We owe $269,000,000,000. To pay that debt is your business and my business, and we have got to go back to our people and ask them to pay increased taxes to do it, or else economize in our spending. The only alternative is to go into bankruptcy, and when we go into bankruptcy we change our form of government and lose the government that gave us liberty, that gave us independence, that gave us the right to do the things we have done here in this country, the most free country on the face of the whole earth. We are just about to have a yoke placed upon our necks if we follow the advice and counsel of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, if we follow the advice and counsel of the State Department of the United States of America, and of the President of the United States.

Why should the American taxpayers pay the salaries of the officials of a Socialist government, including a king who gets $2,500,000? And you ask me to go back and tax my people to pay those enormous salaries. Why, one of the princesses over there receives $200,000 a year, which is more than the salary of the President of the United States.

I do not think we have any right to contribute money to pay such emoluments as that. Yet, when the British Government goes in the red and provides for itself a Socialist government by purchasing their coal mines, railroads, electric and telegraph lines, their steel mills, and everything else, they want us to pay the deficit. Socialism does not pay and never did. Why, I would not contribute a quarter of a dollar to go Socialist in this country and I do not propose to ask the taxpayers to contribute that amount of money to take over industries whether it is in Great Britain or any other foreign country. Socialism is like a sore, it gets bigger and bigger, and hurts more and more and more.

Mr. Speaker, we should wake up to the facts now. We should not permit the State Department to obligate us anymore. I want to warn Mr. Snyder, Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Acheson, Secretary of State, that if they are going to come down here and recommend that we spend $16,000,000,000 which you will find reported in this editorial I have included as a part of my remarks, we as Members will turn down the request. If we do not we are not fit to be here as Members of Congress. That is my judgment in this matter.

Refer this whole matter back to the people of this country and let the people vote whether they want to spend this money abroad or not. If they vote to do so, then let them dig down in their pockets to pay the bill and let us stop quibbling about it. It is not right, it is not just, it is not fair for you gentlemen to do the voting and expect your people to pay the bill. They will not vote for you if you do. Every time you vote for the ECA and these other foreign indebtednesses you are taking the American people for a big joy ride. Why, we have given away already over $100,000,000,000 without any accounting whatsoever. Of course, it may be contended that it is doing a lot for this country, but I cannot see it like some of the rest of you do and I think you are getting enough.

Now, what is a billion dollars? Here is an article by Norman P. Rood, of Philadelphia, I want to read to you:

A BILLION DOLLARS

When you read that the Democratic Congress has appropriated thirteen billions for this, ten billions for that; when you learn that the Federal budget is $42,000,000,000 per year; and that Marshall-plan aid to Europe costs us per year $5,500,000,000, and that United States loans and grants to foreign nations have amounted to $103,103,078,135 from World War I to July 1, 1949, and that potato subsidies cost us $225,000,000 in 1948; and that eggs purchased by the Government in order to keep the consumer price high, and dried at considerable expense to preserve them, amounted to 63,000,000 pounds dry weight in September 1949. And that eggs purchased January–September 1949 cost taxpayers $84,251,000. That the loss on them is estimated as $40,000,000. And that total loss on the egg program since 1936 has been $100,045,000. And that salary raises recently granted by Congress increase the Federal pay roll by $10,200,000,000 for year ending June 30, 1950. And that Federal deficit amounted to $2,651,000,000 in July and August 1949 alone, and is expected to reach $5,500,000,000 by the end of the year; and that the national debt amounted to $259,775,958,318. Servicing the debt amounts to $5,500,000,000 per year; and that Federal, State, and local taxes we paid in year ending June 30, 1949, amounted to $54,500,000,000.

Does it make you shudder, Mr. Taxpayer? Do you realize we are pretty well along the road to national bankruptcy with the Communists standing on the side lines hoping we reach that destination? Or don't you realize how much even one billion amounts to?

Well, if Methuselah, the long-lived man of Bible times, had been born on January 1 of the year 1 and had expected to live 2,000 years, he might have decided that he would like to have a billion dollars along about September 1, 1949, to provide for his old age without applying for a pension.

To amass this sum, without accrual of interest, during the period of 1,948⅔ years, including 487 extra days for as many leap years, he must have laid aside $1,404.99 per day for 711,750 days, $42,764.28 per month for 23,384 months, $513,171.57 per year for the 1,948⅔ years. Or if the old fellow decided to live well and spend all his money for a while, say 1,448⅔ years, and save for only 500 years, his budget would have been increased to $3.80 per minute for 262,980,000 minutes; $5,475.70 per day for 182,625 days; $166,666.67 per month for 6,000 months, and $2,000,000 per year for the 500 years.

Of course, to amass this money old Methuselah would have been required to work his printing press quite diligently, just as we are doing today.

If your heart is sound and your nerves shock proof just multiply the figures at the beginning of this article by the Methuselah factors just given. Or apply these factors to the figures you read in the daily papers. Never mind the odd millions and hundreds of thousands, small change, just use the billions which will produce as great a shock as an ordinary person can endure.

For example, it will require $100,000,000 per year for 2,567 years, 9 months, and 4 days to pay off the present national debt, without including interest upon it.

Do the figures startle you, Mr. Taxpayer? Think it over. It's your money. You are the one who pays and pays and pays.

My slogan: Be thrifty in 1950.

To realize what it means to give away a billion dollars, it takes $7 for every man, woman, and child in America. I do not know how many more billions of dollars you can give away without it meaning ruination for us in this country.

Another thing. Getting in debt is one thing and one thing that is bad, but I think notwithstanding that, the greatest thing that is bringing discontent, discomfort, and turmoil to this country is the hatred, the bitterness, and the strife that you are fomenting now in the minds of the people of this country, especially between employer and employee. I think nothing is going to break us down more than that. When the time comes in this country when we have got to pass laws to get people to do the right thing, you are on the wrong track. You have got to educate the people to see the wrong and do the right. You have got to let the people know that the difference between right and an injustice is wrong, and you are not going to get any place with the American people, who are the most intelligent class of people on the face of the earth, if you do not follow that principle. If you show the American people that they are doing the thing in the wrong way, you will not have much difficulty in convincing them of the right road to follow, and they will follow that road.

Take, for instance, the Taft-Hartley Act, an act which I believe the great majority of the Members of this Congress believe is the right thing in trying to regulate the differences between capital and labor. I think the great majority of the people believe that that law was passed for the purpose of trying to do the most good for the greatest number of people and do it in a way which will do right and justice. It is a good law. But that is not the course that the Chief Executive of this country is trying to follow. He is trying to break it down. He is not trying to educate the people in the right way to go, and if he would do that we would be able to get together and we would have a better country because the Chief Executive was doing the right thing.

It is only the wild labor leaders who want more and more power over labor who have Mr. Truman's ear in that respect. They want everything their way or they do not play. All or none is their motto. Do you think Mr. Lewis wants it enforced? No. Do the miners want to work 5 days a week? Yes. Mr. Truman, why not invoke the Taft-Hartley law and give the miners work and the people coal at a reasonable price? Soon all will use oil and we will not need miners or coal. Then where are their jobs? Right is right and wrong is nobody.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

REPAYMENT OF VETERANS' INSURANCE PREMIUMS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I spoke earlier of the fact that the Veterans' Administration is sending out checks for the overpayment of premiums by the veterans into their insurance funds. A mistaken idea has been given out, and I would like to say very emphatically, by the Veterans' Administration. They call them dividends, and do not speak of it as the veterans' own premium money. I should also like to bring to the attention of the House the fact that I understand before many months go by another so-called lot of dividend checks will go out to the veterans, which is also nothing but an overpayment by the veterans of their insurance premiums.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the Committee on Veterans' Affairs will make a complete investigation of the actuarial forces and the operation of the insurance office, because, obviously, a great injustice has been done to the veterans. All of these months they have been paying more than the proper amount in premiums for their insurance.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. And all we are doing is returning the money to the veterans that they have previously overpaid into the Treasury?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Exactly. They paid more than they should have paid, and we are only returning it, and it would have been dishonest to keep it from them.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEATING. It seems to me the gentlewoman might want to add that a number of Members of our party introduced a resolution to force the payment of these so-called dividends, the veterans' own money, last October, and I know that the gentlewoman supported that measure. But we were not able to get anywhere in getting that done. Instead of that they waited until an election year with the hope that these payments might be looked upon as some gratuity from the Government, when they were simply paying them back their own money.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. That is true. And, I should also like to say that an investigation made by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs in the Eightieth Congress brought out these matters to the Veterans' Administration, focusing it on the Veterans' Administration, and that is why these so-called dividend checks are being given to the veterans. It is really their own money going back to them. They never should have been asked for it in the first place.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JOHNSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement.

SIGNING OF DISCHARGE PETITION

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, my predecessor, the Honorable Richard J. Welch, signed Discharge Petition No. 15. I desire to have my name entered on this petition. I ask unanimous consent that his name be taken off the petition so that I may sign it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HORAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

OATH OF OFFICE, MEMBERS AND DELEGATES

The oath of office required by the sixth article of the Constitution of the United States, and as provided by section 2 of the act of May 13, 1884 (23 Stat. 22), to be administered to Members and Delegates of the House of Representatives, the text of which is carried in section 1757 of title XIX of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and being as follows:

I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God.

has been subscribed to in person and filed in duplicate with the Clerk of the House of Representatives by the following Members of the Eighty-first Congress, pursuant to Public Law 412 of the Eightieth Congress, entitled "An act to amend section 30 of the Revised Statutes of the United States" (U. S. C., title 2, sec. 25), approved February 18, 1948:

JOHN F. SHELLEY, Fifth District, California.

EDNA F. KELLY, Tenth District, New York.

SENATE

TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 4, 1950)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, at this daily altar dedicated to the far look, together we bow in the hush and joy of Thy presence pausing in the morning tasks to listen for Thy call sounding in our ears. Lift us, we pray Thee, above the foggy valley of narrow loyalties and partisan interests to vaster vistas where small things are seen as small and great things as great. In all our attitudes and decisions give us perspective and horizon. Save us from substituting cheap shibboleths and slogans for costly thought and impartial investigation. Help us to recognize truth and to welcome revelation from whatever quarter they arrive.

Give us peace in our time, O God, peace with honor, with human dignity vindicated and social justice the canopy of all the nations. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. FULBRIGHT, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 13, 1950, was dispensed with.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his suggestion of the absence of a quorum for a moment?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I withhold the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the order, the time is divided equally between the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] until 1 o'clock, at which time the vote is to be taken. Of course, the time consumed in any roll call or quorum call will be taken out of the time between now and 1 o'clock and the Chair feels that the division of time applies to the time that is left.

Mr. WHERRY. I understand the time taken by the quorum call is to be charged equally to both sides.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. That is satisfactory.

Mr. WHERRY. I agree.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hill	Maybank
Anderson	Hoey	Millikin
Benton	Holland	Mundt
Brewster	Humphrey	Murray
Bricker	Hunt	Myers
Bridges	Ives	Neely
Butler	Jenner	O'Conor
Byrd	Johnson, Colo.	O'Mahoney
Capehart	Johnson, Tex.	Pepper
Cordon	Johnston, S. C.	Robertson
Darby	Kefauver	Russell
Donnell	Kem	Saltonstall
Douglas	Kerr	Schoeppel
Downey	Kilgore	Smith, Maine
Dworshak	Knowland	Sparkman
Eastland	Langer	Taft
Ecton	Leahy	Taylor
Ellender	Lehman	Thomas, Okla.
Ferguson	Lodge	Thomas, Utah
Flanders	Long	Thye
Frear	Lucas	Tobey
Fulbright	McCarran	Tydings
George	McCarthy	Vandenberg
Gillette	McClellan	Watkins
Graham	McFarland	Wherry
Green	McKellar	Wiley
Gurney	McMahon	Williams
Hayden	Magnuson	Withers
Hendrickson	Malone	Young
Hickenlooper	Martin

Mr. MYERS. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] are absent on official business as members of a subcommittee of the Committee on Public Works, holding hearings on various flood-control and public-works projects in the State of New Mexico.

I announce further that the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] is absent on important public business.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business of the Committee on Public Works.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] is absent on official business.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE FOR SENATOR SMITH OF NEW JERSEY AND STATEMENT BY HIM OF REASON FOR HIS ABSENCE

Mr. WILEY obtained the floor.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No Senator can be recognized for any purpose unless he is yielded to by one of the two Senators who have charge of the floor.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I wish to yield a minute to the Senator from New Jersey.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas yields 1 minute to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, at the session on Friday last, in the course of the colloquies in respect to the unanimous-consent agreement, I made the statement that "If the Senate enters into the unanimous-consent agreement to vote on Tuesday, we"—meaning my distinguished colleague [Mr. SMITH of New Jersey] and myself—"will be here to vote on Tuesday."

I did not know at the time that the senior Senator from New Jersey had commitments in New Jersey other than the inaugural ceremony at the State capitol.

Accordingly, I now ask unanimous consent, first, that my colleague be excused from attendance on the session of the Senate today and, secondly, that a formal statement prepared by my colleague pertaining to his absence from the session today be inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request for leave of absence of the senior Senator from New Jersey is granted, and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement by Mr. SMITH of New Jersey is as follows:

Mr. President, at my request my colleague, the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON], is inserting this statement for me in the RECORD because of my necessary absence today.

I note in the RECORD of Friday last the colloquy with regard to the unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the pending Wiley-Gillette substitute for the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, and so forth. When this colloquy took place, while I had answered to the roll call, I was attending a prolonged meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee and did not return to the floor until after the unanimous-consent agreement had been made. In the RECORD it appears that my distinguished colleague from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON] stated that: "If the Senate enters into the unanimous-consent agreement to vote on Tuesday, we will be here to vote on Tuesday." My colleague was thoroughly justified in making this statement for both of us under ordinary circumstances, but I find myself in a situation which makes it unavoidably necessary for me to be absent today. Not only are we inaugurating our Governor, but in addition to that I have had a long-standing commitment to make an address later in the day in an important anniversary celebration in the State and it will not be possible for me to be in Washington for the 1 o'clock vote and keep these two important commitments.

I am, therefore, requesting my colleague to ask unanimous consent that I be excused from attendance today. I have endeavored to arrange for pairs on the contemplated vote or votes. I understand distinctly from the colloquy that took place as recorded in the RECORD that the so-called civil rights amendments will not be considered in connection with the votes taken today.

I would have made this statement myself at the Monday session, but the recess over Monday has prevented my doing so.

H. ALEXANDER SMITH.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I yield myself 30 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the Senate has now been engaged for some time in consideration of the very important subject now before it. As I think of what is involved there comes to my mind an incident which occurred after Columbus returned to Spain, following his discovery of America. He thought he had discovered the Indies. When he returned to Spain much was made of him. A banquet was held in his honor, during which one individual asked Columbus "Do you think, sir, that I could have discovered the Indies?" Columbus paid no attention. Finally, after a persistent pressing of the question Columbus picked up an egg and said, "Can any of you make this egg stand on end?" The answer was in the negative. Columbus tapped the end of the egg on the table and it stood upright, on end. The guest who had directed the question to Columbus said, "Well, if I had thought of it I could have done the same." "Yes," said Columbus, "and if you had thought of it you also could have discovered the Indies."

What we must do in connection with the issue now pending before the Senate is to think straight and not be confused by our emotions, our prejudices, or what not.

A FINAL SUMMARY OF ARGUMENTS FOR GILLETTE-WILEY DAIRY AMENDMENT

Mr. President, last Friday, I spoke briefly on one of the two major problems which concern the American people today. Those two problems are:

First. How can we prevent and keep out of a terrible third world war? and Second. How can we prevent a depression?

OLEO LEGISLATION CAN PRECIPITATE DEPRESSION

With reference to the second problem, I firmly feel that the legislation which we are now considering can have a crucial effect. I say a crucial effect. Enactment of the right kind of legislation can be of help to prevent us from sliding into a depression.

Time will not permit me to present a complete summary of our position on this issue, but those parts I am unable to cover orally will be placed in the RECORD, with the kind consent of the Senate.

Yes, Mr. President, as I have indicated, the passage of the bill H. R. 2023, the oleo legislation, if it be not amended, can plunge us into an economic tailspin; it can start a series of circumstances which can inevitably lead the heart of the Nation into what might be called an economic paralysis.

At this point I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the table which appears on page 153 of the hearings before the Senate Committee on Finance, showing the percentage of the milk produced in 10 States which goes into butter. It ranges from 72.6 percent to 15.1 percent.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Butter-producing States with more than 400,000 cow population

	Percent of milk into butter	Percent decline in cow population since 1945
North Dakota	72.6	28.4
South Dakota	68.2	25.3
Iowa	65.3	16.9
Nebraska	58.5	24.7
Kansas	41.7	22.9
Minnesota	39.5	14.3
Colorado	33.1	14.3
Oklahoma	32.3	22.8
Missouri	18.8	12.6
Arkansas	15.1	17.0

WHERE WILL HUGE MILK OUTPUT GO?

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask my associates to ponder what will happen to the 30 percent of the fluid milk of this Nation which at present finds its way into butter. What will happen to that great flood of billions of pounds of milk unless new markets can be found for it? Yes, Mr. President, the great hope those of us who favor the dairy amendment have is that, if perchance, our amendment should unfortunately be defeated, the inventive genius of the American people will find new dairy outlets for that flood of milk so as to prevent catastrophe in American agriculture.

Mr. President, we have the hope that the inventive genius of the American people will, through chemistry, do for the dairy industry what it has done for the oleo industry. We, in the Middle West, are never licked. I hope outlets will be found for the flood of milk. But, Mr. President, I want to say that in the East, even here in the Washington market, the doors have been closed against our milk. If our butter market is taken from us, we will show the Congress a volume of pressure of milk that will blow these doors wide open. It is not possible to take the livelihood away from 30,000,000 people without feeling an economic and moral and political pressure which will have widespread results. Mr. President, we can deliver all the milk that can be used by the people in the Washington area; we can deliver it at 10 cents a quart and still get our 8 cents, whereas in our area now we are getting only 5 cents a quart, and dairy farmers are reducing their production.

Unless new outlets are found, we may well find ourselves returning to the bleak days of the 1930's, when American agriculture was in the depths of economic chaos.

Fortunately there is a great resilience in the people of the Midwest. Just as they created the economic bread basket of America, just as they developed their region into the richest heart of America, so it is our prayer that the Midwest will find the answer through modern chemistry to the problem of adequate disposition of this flood of milk.

It is inconceivable that the representatives of the rest of the people of the country would let us down. We have helped build this Nation, but now some would stick a dagger in our backs. However, we will pull the dagger out, if that happens; and those in this area, those in Maryland and Virginia and West Virginia, who control this milkshed area, whose farmers get 20 and 22 cents a quart for milk, will find that they cannot keep us shut out all the time. We ask the Senators from all the States to cooperate with us in this fight, to help us get the break so that at least we can get 8 cents a quart for our milk.

STATES MUST TIGHTEN OLEO REGULATIONS

Fortunately, too, there is another possibility, and that is for the respective States to tighten regulations in order to prevent fraud and deception on their consumers. We ask all Members of the Senate to help us do that. I have already shown in the debate on this floor that in the State of Arkansas, where there is a requirement that all restaurants and other public places serving oleomargarine must post a notice to that effect, 69 out of 100 serving places violated that State law. But we ask the Representatives in Congress of the other States to be fair. If they are going to do this thing to us, then let them be fair to their consumers and to the eating public, so that fraud will not be perpetrated on them. If the dairy amendment is voted down, the gates of interstate commerce will be opened, at least insofar as the Federal Government is concerned, to an inundation by imitation butter. But the respective commonwealths will still be able to protect their citizens within their own borders, unless the Oleomargarine Trust controls the politics of those States. I believe the various State legislatures should give their earnest attention to this problem. The farmers have not been organized, and now the result is that we have this pressure in the shape of the legislation which is pending here today.

But, Mr. President, in spite of these two partial remedies, let us not underestimate the gravity of the present crisis. I am not picking a crisis out of the air. I am saying that when the livelihood is taken from more than 2,500,000 farmers and when 29 percent of the milk production is taken away from its legitimate channel, then a severe crisis is created; and it is a major one, not a minor one. In my State, although the Democrats in 1948 promised the farmers that prices would be kept up, already there has been a tumbling of prices in an average amount of 25 percent. That will immediately affect the national revenue. It also will affect the purchasing power of the farmers. Now the situation has been muddled all the more, and the present developments are worse. So there will be chaos, as I have said, unless—and I have hope for this—the chemists of America, the ingenuity of America, find an answer to the crisis which thus has been created.

RAPE OF BUTTER INDUSTRY IS BUT FIRST ACT IN THIS TRAGEDY

If the Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment is defeated, then, as I have stated, I fear that we shall have started a chain reaction whose final effects no man on either side can accurately predict. The rape of the butter industry—and, Mr. President, I use that description advisedly—is but the first act which the monopolists will perform in order to obliterate all other segments of the American dairying industry—cheese, fluid milk, evaporated milk, and so forth.

EVIL CONSEQUENCES OF BODY BLOW TO DAIRYING

"So, what?" a cynic might ask. "So, what?" Mr. President, one might as well ask, "So, what?" if America's far-flung automobile industry were destroyed, for remember that the $7,000,000,000 of dairy value in 1949 was about equal to the value of the American automobile industry. And dairying, involving as it does our health, our soil, the life of 2,500,000 farmers, involves the very heart of our way of life.

The evil consequences are so staggering to contemplate that one shudders at the prospect, if the oleo bill should pass, of tens of thousands of deserted farms, of villages becoming ghost towns because they were dependent upon farmers who had to auction off their stock and other assets. One shudders to think of the consequences to State and Federal tax revenues because of the loss of the dairying segment which accounts for 22 percent of all American farm income.

In 1940, America's farm population was 30,500,000. This year it is 28,000,000. We are forcing more and more people from the farms into the overcrowded cities. We are taking steps that can only lead to the waste and the ravaging of the soil. We are endangering the very fundamentals of the American economy. Yet all that some of our local newspapers can see in the situation is the tax issue which is involved.

THIS IS NOT SCARE PROPAGANDA

Again the cynic might scoff at what he might feel to be scare propaganda, exaggerated fearist talk. But, Mr. President, the record of decline in dairy herds, the record of the 25-percent loss in dairy income in 1 year, the record of the insidious creeping larceny by the Oleo Trust—stealing 40 percent, then more and more of the table-spread market by deception—all this record attests to the accuracy of these predictions.

DAIRY PARALYSIS WILL NOT OCCUR OVERNIGHT

I do not say the decline in the dairy industry and the blight of the dairying Midwest will occur overnight. Rather, it will creep like a fog, slowly involving more and more geographic areas, paralyzing our economic life. It may take years, but the consequences will be lasting. This generation will feel them to a tremendous degree, while succeeding generations will experience even worse consequences that will have accumulated over the years.

We who support the Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment have sought to protect the legitimate interests of our States. But we would not have fought either as hard or as long if we had not been firmly convinced that the issues at stake were of far greater consequence to all 48 States than the opposition has indicated.

ONE-PACKAGE DAIRY EXCISE-TAX AMENDMENT NECESSARY

I appeal to my colleagues to support not only the original Gillette-Wiley amendment as perfected by the McCarthy-Aiken provisions, but to stand by the excise-tax-repeal amendment in a one-package approach to these interrelated matters.

The fate of the country depends upon this vote, Mr. President. American dairying may be defeated, but the defeat will weigh heavily on the hearts of those responsible for it and on the American people in the generations that are to follow.

When oleo sells for two or three times as much as it does now, and when the dairy herds no longer fertilize the soil, but are depleted so greatly that America's beef and the veal supply will be largely gone, and when we have to import what we now have in abundance, then the words and the deeds of those of us who have fought for the substitute amendment will be remembered.

SUMMARY OF SPEECHES MADE BY SENATORS ON BEHALF OF THE DAIRY AMENDMENT

Mr. President, a look at the RECORD will reveal the distinguished group of Senators who have spoken on behalf of the dairy amendment. I should like now to pay a brief but sincere tribute to them for their valued contributions. Each one of them carried the ball. No one of them wanted to be the hero, the "Grange." No one of them wanted to be the big shot. Each one of them was a member of the team. No one of them tried to steal the ball from another. I feel proud to be associated with such a group.

JANUARY 5 DEBATE

On Thursday, January 5, my distinguished colleague from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], cosponsor of the dairy substitute amendment, very carefully analyzed the oleomargarine bill. He very decisively proved the sheer inability of Federal authorities to enforce the so-called labeling provisions of the Senate Finance Committee's version of the oleo bill. He demonstrated conclusively that these provisions to label and identify oleo under that version are a farce and unworkable.

JANUARY 6 DEBATE

The following day, on January 6, we received a comprehensive analysis of the issues involved in this dispute from the able senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN]. Our colleague proved that butter is the balance wheel of dairying and that the destruction of the butter market will inevitably lead to the sticking of a dagger into the heart of dairying as a whole.

That same day my able associate from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY], offered a well justified amendment which would prevent the use by the oleo interests of dairy references in their advertising. I was glad to accept this amendment to the substitute amendment.

JANUARY 10 DEBATE

The next legislative day, Monday, January 9, was devoted to a discussion of United States foreign policy and the United States budget. Debate did not therefore resume on this issue until Tuesday, January 10. At that time it was led off by my colleague, the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], who did a splendid job in analyzing the world-wide monopoly of Unilever, Ltd., which controls table fats and oils throughout the globe, and which is among the largest producers of oleo in our country. The Senator from Minnesota demonstrated that the total production of the five principal oleo corporations accounts for 68.4 percent of the domestic output today, which in turn is an increase of 7 percent over their total output a few months ago.

Then followed the remarks of the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG]. Among the many telling points made by our colleague was the drastic effect of soybean and cotton farming in impairing the health of the soil. This point was reinforced by our experienced associate, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER], who followed with an impressive description of those unhappy lands which have "devaluated their dairy industry and have failed to practice animal husbandry." "Then," said the Senator from Nebraska, "compare those countries with Denmark, Sweden, Switzerland, Holland, and other agriculture-conscious nations." The Senator from Nebraska went on to evaluate very closely the great menace created by synthetic products of natural agricultural commodities and all the implications of that menace.

That same day, January 10, we were treated to a splendid discussion by the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. ECTON], who pointed out the complete inconsistency of the Federal Government's supporting dairy prices on the one hand and stabbing the dairy industry in the back on the other. Following the remarks of the Senator from Montana I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 279, a table setting forth all the materials used in the manufacture of oleomargarine during the past 20 years.

JANUARY 11 DEBATE

January 11, 1950, provided another harvest of discussion and fact presentation on this issue, beginning with the splendid commentary of the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE]. Our colleague from his long experience in dairying affairs, pointed out many striking facts, including the wide price spread which exists today between different brands of oleo, indicating the ability of the Oleo Trust to juggle prices as it pleases. The senior Senator from Minnesota also pointed out the very clear fact that in 1948, 3,750,000 surplus cotton bales were under cotton bale loan. Thus there was a total United States investment of almost $600,000,000, an average of about $160 a bale. The senior Senator from Minnesota pointed out that we need to find some way to divert some of those acres devoted to cotton to some other kind of crop—and the same holds true for surplus corn—rather than cause further cotton or corn overproduction.

None of my colleagues who were present in the Senate on January 11 will forget the address which followed, delivered by the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], who gave one of the most impressive descriptions which we have had of the world-wide monopoly of oleo. We are indebted to the senior Senator from North Dakota for pointing out what we fear is not merely a coincidence in the relationship between (a) Mr. Charles Luckman, as head of the Democratic Jackson-Jefferson Day dinners, raising funds for the Democratic Party and (b) the zeal of the Democratic Party to pass this oleo legislation.

JANUARY 12 DEBATE

On Thursday, January 12, we were treated to a brilliant analysis of the question by the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], who analyzed the contradictory record of the Democratic Party in pretending to be a friend of the dairy farmer at the very same time it was destroying the market of the farmer. I may mention at this point the unfortunate stand of our Democratic colleagues who are seeking to strip the excise-tax repeal amendment from the dairy substitute amendment, thus threatening the fate of both.

On that day, we benefited too by a discussion by one of the ablest legal minds in the Senate, our colleague, the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON]. He brought to our attention the decision of the United States Supreme Court, which twice upheld the constitutionality of the Filled Milk Act. Following the address of the junior Senator from Michigan, we heard of the dishonest advertising campaign conducted by the oleo manufacturers in attempting to utilize dairy terms and grade descriptions. This discussion was handled by my associate, the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY], whose worthy advertising amendment I have previously referred to.

Still another comprehensive treatment of this subject came from our associate, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], who pointed out the crucial effects of the loss of the butter market on the American dairy industry.

JANUARY 13 DEBATE

That brings us to Friday, January 13, when the position of the great State of Iowa was again clearly expressed by our colleague, the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], who warned us that imitation butter is but a first step in wholesale fraud against the dairy industry, to be followed by filled cheese and other synthetic products. Our colleague the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] then presented the results of a public-opinion poll on the butter problem. Among the striking facts in that poll was that 53 percent of the women approved of legislation which involved practically the very provisions of the Gillette-Wiley substitute amendment, while only 18 percent of them disapproved, and 29 percent had no opinion.

I COULD NOT ATTEMPT A COMPLETE SUMMARY

Mr. President, in addition to the above principal addresses, there were many splendid interrogations and brief comments delivered by other Members of the Senate. As I indicated at the start, I could not attempt to try to present a complete summary of either their arguments or their telling questions, but I did not want to let this opportunity pass without expressing my sincere thanks to my colleagues.

CONDENSATION OF OUR MAJOR ARGUMENTS

Let me summarize now our principal points in this argument under these major headings:

First. The moral right to protect butter's yellow color.

Second. The free-enterprise factor—protecting the little fellow against monopoly.

Third. The consumer factor—protecting our people from fraud and deception and from impairment of health.

Fourth. The factor of the over-all economic consequences to the Nation.

FIRST MAJOR ARGUMENT, THE MORAL RIGHT TO PROTECT BUTTER'S YELLOW COLOR

First. There is a moral right of the dairy industry to protect what amounts to its common-law trade-mark. Let the Washington press say something about that. Let someone use their names, and see how quickly they will react to it. Shame on the ignorance of men who write as they have written within the past few days.

(a) Many products protect their color from imitation by other corporations, for example, yellow color of Yellow Cab Co.; red color of Lifebuoy soap, of which Luckman is now the boss.

WE DO NOT OBJECT TO LEGITIMATE COMPETITION

(b) The butter industry does not object to legitimate-type imitation; for example, oleo imitation of butter's flavoring, butter's packaging, butter's melting point, butter's specific gravity, and so forth, but the butter industry draws the line when it comes to the last crucial feature—color—because such imitation gives an opportunity to perpetrate a fraud not only on the dairy industry, but on the consumer.

(c) The Supreme Court has twice sustained as constitutional the Federal Filled Milk Act. This act provided a perfect precedent in confirming right of Congress to prevent subterfuge and deception on consumer when artificial, filled milk was attempted to be shipped in interstate commerce, even though that product was as allegedly nutritious as the natural product.

(d) The pending dairy amendment does not interfere in intrastate affairs in contrast to the oleo bill itself, which would put Federal snoopers in all the Nation's restaurants—that is, in intrastate business—if an attempt were made to secure enforcement.

SECOND MAJOR ARGUMENT, FURTHERANCE OF UNITED STATES FREE ENTERPRISE

Second. Furtherance of our free enterprise system requires protection of dairy industry.

(a) In any contest between five or six huge billion-dollar corporations, as against two and one-half million little fellows, it is only fair and right that the United States Government should protect the small man, the family-type farmer. To do otherwise is to accelerate a trend toward monopoly and bigness which everyone admits is harmful to free enterprise.

(b) In addition to two and one-half million dairy farmers, there are 40,000 processing plants, 3,500 creameries, and literally hundreds of thousands—yes, millions of jobs involved in hauling milk from the farmer to the ultimate consumer and in all of the intermediate steps. All of these jobs will be threatened by the pending legislation.

OLEO INDUSTRY IS FAR FROM BEING DISCRIMINATED AGAINST

(c) The oleo industry is completely unjustified in pleading that it is being discriminated against in a manner contrary to the principle of free enterprise. A look at the statute books shows that oleo, far from being placed at a disadvantage, is actually pampered in relation to butter. The oleo makers have a tariff of 22 cents per pound against foreign competition. Butter has a 7-cents-per-pound tariff. When we tried to cut out the 15-cent margin and equalize the tariff, the supposed protectors of the consumer in the House of Representatives screamed and squawked and killed the motion. Yes, these boys have a lot of power.

The oleo makers can use preservatives in their product; butter cannot.

Oleo can be reheated and processed without being labeled as such; butter cannot. Oleo can be made from any number of fats; butter cannot. If a foreign substance is added to butter, such butter must pay the present 10-cents-per-pound Federal tax the same as oleo. In other words, the butter industry has no advantage over any other industry, and allows to be imposed upon itself even higher standards than statutes impose upon oleo. The butter industry has always had the housewife's and the consumer's legitimate interests uppermost in its consideration.

BUTTER ONLY OCCASIONALLY ADDS COLOR

(d) To be sure, a slight coloring is occasionally added to butter. But when a butter maker deepens the color of butter he desires to achieve the opposite effect from that intended by the oleo manufacturers. The one intends to bring out the natural color of his product—and this is only done in a few northern States in the winter period when comparatively very little butter is produced—while the other, the oleo manufacturer, intends to imitate the color of another product and to change the basic color of cottonseed oil and soybean oil.

It is not true that their product is naturally yellow, as oleo spokesmen have frequently contended. The most careful scientific tests have demonstrated, once and for all, that oleomargarine made of domestic oils is gray-green or off-white, with no natural resemblance to the color of butter. It is impossible to make naturally yellow oleomargarine out of domestic vegetable oils, according to the Armour Research Foundation.

THIRD MAJOR ARGUMENT, PROTECTING THE WELFARE OF AMERICA'S CONSUMERS

Third. One hundred and fifty million American consumers will be helped, not hurt, by the dairy substitute amendment.

(a) Butter is sold with minimum parity support by Government. Its actual price is set in the 48 States, according to the law of supply and demand, when the 2,500,000 dairy farmers send their product to market. On the other hand, the oleo price is set, not according to the law of supply and demand, but according to whatever the Oleo Trust feels the traffic will bear. If oleo is sold at a low price now, it is purely in line with the strategy of the Oleo Trust to emphasize a wide difference between butter's price and oleo's price. However, once butter is driven from the market it can be predicted with certainty that the Oleo Trust will raise the price of colored oleo.

DAIRYING IS VITAL TO NUTRITION

(b) The consumer depends upon American dairying for his health and nutrition. Anything which serves to reduce the flow of milk into dairy products hurts America's diet. Since butter serves as the outlet for 30 percent of all fluid milk, it is inevitable that, once the butter market is destroyed, dairy herds will be drastically reduced, according to some predictions by as much as 2,000,000 animals. This inevitably means less milk available for cheese, bottled milk, and so forth. Moreover, dairy herds provide 75 percent of United States veal and 30 percent of United States beef. The effect on veal and beef supplies and prices will, therefore, be drastic once dairy herds are liquidated.

UNCOLORED OLEO CAN BE COLORED IN KITCHEN

(c) Consumers can easily color uncolored oleo according to their preference in their own kitchen in 120 seconds. Coloring oleo by a capsule or any other handy device is no more difficult than peeling vegetables or performing 100 other household chores. The difference in requiring those few seconds of coloring may spell the difference between continuation or destruction of the United States dairy industry.

(d) The "butterlegging"—that is, butter bootlegging—that existed when the original oleo regulations were set up will be as child's play compared to the new rackets which will spring up if House bill 2023, unamended, is enacted.

If Federal regulations of yellow oleo are to be repealed, the oleomargarine manufacturers will once more have "butterleggers" for customers. If an immense "butterlegging" business sprang up, as it did when the spread between butterine and real butter was only 10 cents a pound, what else can be expected at today's difference in prices? And if the "butterlegging" racket prospered despite all kinds of early restrictions and penalties, what may we anticipate when all restraints are off?

None of us is so naive as to believe that the situation can be handled by the Pure Food and Drug Administration, or by similarly undermanned agencies. We shall find that our available manpower is wholly unable to cope with thousands of individual racketeers.

(e) "Butterlegging" would be easy. Testimony on oleomargarine legislation in hearings before both Senate and House committees revealed that it would be relatively simple to switch packaged yellow oleo into standard butter cartons. Such an operation would require only 2 or 3 minutes per package and could be performed by nonskilled workers. A profit of up to 40 cents a pound could be realized by such fraud.

A yellow oleo, legalized in interstate commerce, would make it simple, convenient, inexpensive, and even almost acceptable, to perpetrate such frauds.

(f) Fraud is actually already increasing. Last year the dairy industry reported a survey, which has never been refuted in any respect, and which showed that one out of three restaurants in a selected list of large cities was deceptively serving oleo for butter. The 1949 Arkansas data, which I cite below, indicate a far higher proportion—double as much fraud.

Arkansas State law already embodies regulations similar to those contained in House bill 2023, but a survey in February, 1949, disclosed that 66 out of 100 Arkansas restaurants were violating oleo regulations. The current Senate Finance Committee report omits all reference to this survey.

(g) Labeling provisions of House bill are inadequate. The oleo bloc in Congress has frequently said that labeling provisions are ample protection against fraud. That this is not true is clearly shown by the following excerpts from a noted Supreme Court decision—Carolene Products Co. v. United States (65 S. Ct. 1, 323 U. S. 18):

> In dealing with the evils of filled milk, Congress reached the conclusion that labeling was not an adequate remedy for deception.
> Here a milk product, skimmed milk, from which a valuable element—butterfat—has been removed is artificially enriched with cheaper fats and vitamins so that it is indistinguishable in the eyes of the average purchaser from whole milk products. The result is that the compound is confused with and passed off as the whole milk product in spite of proper labeling.

FOURTH MAJOR ARGUMENT—THE OVER-ALL EVIL CONSEQUENCES OF OLEO LEGISLATION

Fourth. The economic consequences to all 48 States are staggering to contemplate.

(a) The heart of this Nation, speaking from a geographical standpoint and from many other standpoints — the dairying Midwest—will inevitably suffer an economic blight if this legislation is enacted. Dairying has always constituted the most prosperous, the most advanced, enlightened segment of American agriculture. It pays the highest wages for farm labor. It is the greatest consumer of industrial products of any type of farming.

All types of farming are, in turn, a better customer for industry's products than is any other segment of our population. To strike at dairying, therefore, means harm to all American farming, and to strike at farming, in turn, means to push our entire Nation into an economic tailspin. It has been conclusively proven that practically all American depressions have begun by a nose dive in farm prices.

(b) In 1949 dairying suffered a loss in cash income by 25 percent. Indirectly, in States which depend upon dairying, that loss was far greater. If this loss continues, whole communities whole counties, whole regions of the Midwest will feel an increasing creeping paralysis. From the step where the farmer mortgages his farm, sells his animals, it is only a short step to the businessman in the village closing down his enterprise and the bank closing its doors. When the farmer stops buying, the factories of the Nation will have inevitably to reduce production and in many instances close down completely. If any of my listeners feel this is an exaggeration of the consequences of this legislation, let him remember that these are not my predictions. These are the conservative estimates of men who have devoted a lifetime to studying the dairy industry.

(c) Dairying operates according to basic laws. Unless a butter market is available in the flush season, it is inevitable that the farmer will have to cut down his year-around output of milk, and this will start the chain reaction I have referred to above. It follows necessarily that with the dairy income cut and the Nation's income and the manufacturer's income cut and labor's income cut, there will not be much left for the Government to get its taxes from.

SOUTHERN FARMER WILL NOT BE HELPED

(d) Some may argue that dairying's loss will be the South's gain. Nothing could be further from the case because dairying is a far better customer for the southern farmer than the oleo industry is. If dairy herds are liquidated, a tremendous amount of soybean meal and cottonseed meal will find that it has lost its market.

I personally feel that, perhaps, we could have been engaged more profitably here in the Senate in these last 2 weeks if, instead of the cotton representatives seeking to take over the butter market and we seeking to preserve the same for the 2,500,000 dairy farmers, if instead of that we all had put our brains to work so as to get a better way of distribution for the surpluses in both cotton and butterfat.

(e) Dairying gives to the farmer a better return than does oleo ingredients. The farmer gets around 70 percent of the retail dollar paid by the consumer for butter. By contrast, the farmer gets only 30 percent of the retail dollars paid by the consumer for oleo.

WHY FOLLOW CONTRADICTORY POLICIES ON DAIRYING?

(f) It is completely inconsistent for the Government to be supporting declining dairy prices on the one hand and to take an action which will mean further declining in dairy prices and expenditures by the Government in order to fulfill legal requirements for parity support.

Through last November 16 the Department of Agriculture had purchased, in supporting prices of producers of milk and butterfat, 284,000,000 pounds of nonfat dry milk, 101,000,000 pounds of butter, and 22,000,000 pounds of cheddar cheese. This was at an expenditure of $110,000,000. Lest, however, my colleagues think such dairy support was excessive, let me point out that the Commodity Credit Corporation has made loans on cotton each year since 1933 with the exception of 1936. The total of such loans amounted to a little less than $3,000,000,000 through mid-1949.

UNITED STATES SOIL CONSERVATION INVOLVED

(g) Still another economic consequence is an uncountable loss to the top soil of America. Every agricultural expert who has ever testified before Congress has set forth the superiority of dairying to any type of field-crop farming. The dairy cow enriches the soil in a more efficient economic continuous way than is available through any other type of agriculture. Field crops have led to soil erosion, dust bowls, and economic blight, in whole States, as attested by such outstanding soil conservationists as the noted author, Louis Bromfield, and other farm leaders, and the United States Department of Agriculture.

So, if the Congress should unwisely act to cut the throat of the dairy cow—literally and figuratively, speaking, cut the throat of the mother of the race—it will at the same time be destroying the factor which assures the health of that precious 6 inches of United States top soil.

EXCERPTS OF LETTERS FROM WISCONSIN

Mr. President, I have in my office literally hundreds of letters sent to me by dairy farmers and other folks in Wisconsin pleading that the natural color of butter be protected in interstate commerce.

These letters were not dictated by $150,000 a year executives sitting in plush offices, surveying a billion dollar oleo enterprise. These were signed by plain, humble folks owning 80, 100 or 120 acres, working sunup to sundown, breaking their backs day and night 7 days a week, 52 weeks a year trying to produce an ever finer natural product and asking only that they receive reasonable protection of the law.

DAIRY FARMERS ARE TRYING TO PROTECT MORE THAN OWN INTEREST

Cynics will scoff at these letters. They may say: "Huh. These farmers are only looking after their own interests." To be sure, Mr. President, they are, of course, looking after their own interests and they have a right to do so, because it is certain that if they do not, the oleo trust certainly will not.

But these farmers are thinking, too, of more than their own farms. These farmers are prducing milk and butter and cheese for the Nation's youngsters and adults. They have known the deep satisfaction of contributing to the health of American bodies and, too, they have contributed to the health of America's soil. These are not robbers of the soil; they give to the soil whatever they take from it and even more. They are trying to preserve America's land heritage at the same time as trying to make a decent income for their wives and children.

These dairy farmers are not seeking to inflict any harm on the soybean farmers or the cotton farmers. On the contrary, as I have proved, they constitute the best customers of those southern farmers. All that they are seeking to do is to prevent themselves from being swindled, yes, to prevent the swindling of the American consumer.

WISCONSIN IS NOT THE LEADING BUTTER STATE

I am sure my colleagues in other States have received similar letters. I call attention to the fact that Wisconsin alone is not interested in this issue. In fact in 1948 only a small percentage of Wisconsin milk went into butter. Only 8.8 percent of the Nation's butter was produced in Wisconsin. But dairy farmers in the Badger State and elsewhere understand the critical tie-up in all 48 States between butter and other dairy products, and between butter and the Nation's soil.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD some comments from Wisconsin dairy farmers.

There being no objection, the comments were ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

COMMENTS FROM WISCONSIN DAIRY FARMERS

From Gleason, Wis.:

"DEAR SENATOR WILEY: I am a veteran of World War II with about $12,000 mortgage on my dairy farm from which I am making a fair living. What would I do if the oleo people slip that repeal over on us dairy farmers—why, we just wouldn't be able to make a living."

From Neillsville, Wis.:

"I wish to express my appreciation for your fight against the oleo bill. * * * I am a veteran, I have been on the farm training program for 2 years now and we have discussed this problem a great deal and I feel that we, the dairy farmer, will suffer more than a great many farmers realize if this bill is passed. I am a dairy farmer on an 80-acre farm and I have a family with four children."

From Dresser, Wis.:

"I am writing you in the interest of the dairy farmer. With the wish that you earnestly and forcefully oppose this yellow-oleo bill. I am writing this as an individual farmer but I also represent about 327 patron farmers of Rock Ridge Dairy Co-op."

From Clam Falls, Wis.:

"I am writing to you regarding the efforts of the oleo people to be allowed to imitate butter by coloring it yellow so that it would pass as the real thing in place of what it is. I know that you will fight for us to prevent the legalizing of fraud for us farmers cannot leave our farms and stock to come to Washington to fill the balconies of the Capitol protesting."

From Antigo, Wis.:

"In regard to the bill favoring oleomargarine, it don't seem right after we worked so hard for years to build up good herds that this bill should go through and substitutes be favored. There would be too many farmers who would have to discontinue dairy farming."

From Neillsville, Wis.:

"I am a dairy farmer and am quite concerned over the oleo question. To me the sale of untaxed colored oleo in competition with butter is only the beginning of other synthetic products in competition with dairy products.

"On my farm I practice soil conservation, which I can do in dairying, grasses, and long rotation of crops. Now, if I must raise cash crops because of no dairy-product market, it will not be in the best interest of soil conservation."

From Wausau, Wis.:

"We do not believe the average American consumer wants a substitute for the genuine. Whenever we visit in town, 990 prefer butter to oleo. We believe this bill is being pushed by the makers of oleo so they can make a few more dollars. How would they like it if the farmer would come up with an inferior product. They sure would squawk."

From Phlox, Wis.:

"I live in a community that is strictly dairy. My greatest ambition was to build up a good dairy herd, which I have accomplished. A World War I veteran, I have put everything I got into this herd. I am speaking for a lot of other veterans around here that has done a good job in building their herds but if we have to compete with oleomargarine we face a slim future; we can't just drop everything and move to the city as there is no industry around here."

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, how much time have I remaining?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I now yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, since I first came to the United States Senate in 1941, I have constantly interested myself in the repeal of the unjust taxes and license fees which have been applied to colored oleomargarine.

In 1943 I urged the repeal of these fees by offering an amendment to the Revenue Act. I have appeared before the Senate Finance Committee at every opportunity since I have been here in an effort to urge the committee to report a revenue bill to the Senate with my amendment. My amendment has also been introduced as a bill in its own right.

We have been successful in bringing this legislation to open debate on the Senate floor on two separate occasions. My repeal measure was last offered as an amendment to the Revenue Act of 1948. Again, last year, I went before the Finance Committee in support of House bill 2023.

I am delighted that this measure is now before the Senate in its own right, and I congratulate the Senator from Arkansas and other Senators on their efforts.

The public demand for the removal of these taxes and license fees has reached the point that favorable congressional action can no longer be denied.

I am deeply concerned over the efforts being made to defeat this bill with crippling amendments. I beg the Senate not to defeat the bill in this manner. Even though I shall vote for repeal of some of the excise taxes at the proper time, I shall be forced to vote against these repealers as amendments to this bill. I hope other Senators will join me so that we may have an opportunity to vote this single important issue up or down. Let us then treat the amendments in a like manner in their turn.

I have long been an advocate of repealing most of the wartime excise taxes. However, such repeal amendments are not germane to this bill because the margarine tax is neither a wartime nor an excise tax. Let me remind my colleagues that this method will further retard the efforts for ultimate repeal of the excise taxes when they come to the floor in their own right. Furthermore, oleomargarine for the past 48 years has been handled in the Agriculture Committee, while excise-tax repeals must clearly originate in the House Ways and Means Committee.

The taxes and license fees on margarine need to be removed primarily in the interest of the consumer. The dairy interest charges of special Southern agricultural interest in margarine are both unwarranted and untrue. There is not a sufficient amount of cottonseed used in the manufacture of margarine to warrant any particular concern on behalf of the farmers. The great need for this tax repeal lies in the relief it will afford the consumers.

Under the present laws uncolored margarine is taxed at the rate of one-fourth of a cent a pound, while a 10-cents-a-pound tax is levied on colored margarine. The license fees are equally discriminatory. For example:

	Pay
Retailers—
Handling yellow margarine	$48
Handling uncolored margarine	6
Wholesalers—
Handling yellow margarine	480
Handling uncolored margarine	200

Add to these figures a $600 annual fee for coloring the product, and we can begin to see the unjustness of this discrimination both to the manufacturer and the housewife.

These complex and burdensome regulations make anyone coloring margarine yellow, and serving it to customers or paying guests, liable to a manufacturers' license fee of $600 a year and 10 cents a pound tax on each pound so colored.

These regulations are understandable when we remember the quality of this product when it was first placed on the market and its one claim to consideration was its economy. The present tax and license fees were set by the Congress of 1902, 48 years ago. These were imposed after the crippling taxes and fees of the Oleomargarine Act of 1886. So it is that, after 64 years, the Federal Government still imposes the very same taxes on margarine, which is the only pure food in the land so restricted by national laws.

Mr. President, it is unthinkable, in the light of page after page of testimony such as has been given on behalf of this product, that these ancient and outmoded laws should still rest among our ladened statutes. These laws still stand despite the fact that a small army of witnesses has, in recent years, appeared before committee meeting after committee meeting. They have represented science; manufacturers; wholesalers; retailers; cotton, soybean, livestock, and peanut producers; labor consumers; and hospitals; and they have unequivocally urged the repeal of the discriminatory margarine taxes and license fees.

American margarine is made today from domestic vegetable oils—oils derived from soybeans, cottonseed, peanuts, and corn. Margarine has become the second largest user of soybean oil and also uses about one-fourth of all the cottonseed oil refined in this country. Farmers of 44 States produce the products from which margarine oils are taken. Because of the substantially increased demand for margarine, manufacturers are encouraging production of more of these farm products which produce these fine domestic food oils.

The issue at hand has been boiled down to two basic points: Color and definition of the word "manufacturer." The only basic difference between margarine and butter is that margarine is vegetable fat, butter an animal-fat product. There is actually no perceptible nutritive difference. Each offers about 3,300 calories per pound. The amount of vitamin A in butter varies according to seasonal and other factors; while in margarine it is maximum and uniform the year-round. Both products are equally digestible.

Report after report by medical associations and nutritional scientists declare margarine to be a nutritious, high-quality food.

An official definition and standard of identity was adopted by the United States Food and Drug Administration in 1941 under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938. Under it, margarine has a minimum fat content of 80 percent; the actual average figure is slightly more. The standard requires fortified margarine to contain a minimum of 9,000 U. S. P. units of vitamin A per pound. But 99 percent of all margarine is now fortified with 15,000 units of vitamin, the content always being shown on the label. This margarine fortification is endorsed by the American Medical Association and leading nutritionists.

The nutritional value of the product dispensed with on the word of competent authorities, we come to color.

Artificial color adds nothing to the direct nutritional value of foods. It is not nutritive in itself. But, by satisfying natural color perceptions in relation to the palate, it promotes digestion and thus indirectly aids the process of nutritive assimilation.

A product's "right" to any color is established by consumer preference. There is no patent or natural or common law trade-mark to yellow for butter, for example.

The argument that all that is being done, in the coloring of butter, is restoring a uniform yellow to the product, falls to the ground. For one thing, butter is not colored uniformly, but to meet market demands. Thus, butter coloring is done to suit regional taste preferences—the New York market, I am told, generally prefers butter whiter than Wichita or Kansas City markets.

Butter is only one of the hundreds of food products using artificial coloring. Butter itself uses artificial coloring during most of the months of the year, because butter produced from cows on winter forage is pale yellow in color; frequently white.

Furthermore, the ingredient of butter, cream, has no more, or even less, claim to yellow than the ingredients of margarine, vegetable oils. Cottonseed, soybean, peanut, and corn oil are yellow in color, varying, of course, in degree. Nevertheless, in their natural state, they frequently could convey to the finished product a yellow tint. Because of this, the oil ingredients of margarine must be bleached to avoid the Federal tax of 10 cents a pound and the other penalties imposed on yellow margarine.

Artificial coloring is permitted by the United States Pure Food and Drug Administration when the colors used are certified United States Pure Food and Drug Administration colors. There are scores of those colors, each of which has been approved by the Administration. Under the Pure Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act of 1938, all food products using artificial coloring must label that fact. Margarine is made under a Pure Food and Drug Administration standard of identity and the yellow coloring, used in or packed with margarine, is so labeled. Butter, cheese, and ice cream, however, enjoy special and unique exemption from labeling artificial coloring under the act of 1923.

The effect of the Federal tax and other restrictions on yellow margarine has been to limit that food in production and distribution. In 1946, only 58,000,000 pounds of yellow margarine were produced compared with 514,000,000 pounds of uncolored margarine. A large share of the colored margarine produced was for Government purchase; the Government not paying the tax to itself.

Margarine is denied the use of yellow simply because the butter industry has misused its political power to drive a competitive product off the counter. This is discrimination and a violation of the American principle of fair, openly competitive business.

One of the most unjust points of the Federal law, at least from a monetary value, is the definition of the word "manufacturer." Under the regulations, restaurants, hotels, clubs, charitable institutions, schools, hospitals, churches, and other institutions are all liable to the manufacturers' license fee of $600 per annum and 10-cents-a-pound tax for each pound colored. There is an exception, where an institution under the complete control of the United States, or a State or political subdivision thereof, in the exercise of an essential governmental function, colors margarine for use of inmates or employees of the institution.

It is my sincere belief that these regulations are pointedly designed to restrain the free marketing privileges of one group of manufacturers.

Such an archaic statute in our modern Federal code is almost as incongruous with free trade as the sight of an archer shooting arrows at a modern jet plane.

Mr. President, in the name of free enterprise, in order that this long-ignored discrimination may be corrected, I sincerely hope the Senate will finally take advantage of this opportunity to act favorably on a bill removing these taxes and license fees.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the amendment in the nature of a substitute of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], for himself and other Senators, to the pending bill, H. R. 2023, and I ask unanimous consent that an explanatory statement by me of the amendment be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table, and, without objection, the statement presented by the Senator from Washington will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The statement presented by Mr. MAGNUSON is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MAGNUSON

AN AMENDMENT TO THE AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE (JANUARY 12, 1949, VERSION) TO H. R. 2023

The amendment strikes from the so-called Wiley substitute of the oleomargarine bill all provisions dealing with excise taxes other than those related directly to oleomargarine itself.

Previously I made my position clear on this subject. I am for repeal or reduction of excise taxes on telephone, telegraph, transportation, etc., but I do not believe the oleomargarine bill a proper place to effectuate this objective.

A vote for my amendment should in no way imply that the Senator so acting is against repeal of the excise taxes listed in section 4. My purpose is very simple. I merely wish to keep the oleo-butter controversy entirely separate from the excise-tax question.

I intend to vote for the Wiley substitute, which repeals oleo taxes. At the proper time I intend to vote for repeal of excise taxes. As a matter of fact, H. R. 3905 is now on the Senate Calendar. It can be called up at any time. It deals with many of the same excise taxes as are contained in section 4 of the Wiley substitute. I myself have an amendment lying on the table to H. R. 3905, which proposes to repeal the 3-percent excise tax on transportation of freight.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER].

Mr. BRICKER. Mr. President, there has been considerable discussion during this debate as to the vote recently taken in my State in regard to the manufacture and sale of colored oleomargarine. Many years ago, in fact in 1912, we authorized in the State constitution of Ohio the initiative and referendum. From year to year, more or less regularly, there have been presented to our legislature various bills to make legal the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine in Ohio. None of them had passed until year before last, when an initiated petition was filed in the legislature to bring the subject, as a matter of constitutional right, before the general assembly. The assembly did not approve the bill as initiated by petition. The referendum provisions were taken advantage of by the proponents of the bill, and a referendum to a vote of the people was made possible through a referendum petition. A vote was had at the election in November 1949. There has been a great deal of discussion on the floor of the Senate as to what that vote proved and did not prove.

In the rural counties, of course, the vote against the manufacture and sale of colored oleo was not as strong as it would have been a few years ago, because of the increased planting and marketing of soybeans in my State, a by-product of which is used in the manufacture of oleomargarine.

I have calculated the vote, however, in the various counties, 43 of which voted for the amendment and 45 against it. The 43 counties, with the exception of 5, were what we might term the larger counties of the State, and 44 were what we might class, with the exception of a few, as the smaller counties of the State. I have calculated the vote in those counties which supported the amendment rather strongly, and I find that in the rural sections of those counties the vote against yellow oleomargarine was 399,000 and the vote for it was 308,000.

To clear up any thought that might be entertained that our farmers would vote either very strongly for or against the amendment, a majority were against it in the rural territories of Ohio, particularly in the smaller counties, and yet it was not such an opposition as could in any way influence the outcome of the total vote.

I have analyzed the vote in the cities, the cities including municipalities with a population of over 5,000 people, and villages, those municipalities having under 5,000 people. In 110 cities "yes" votes were in the majority in all but 7. In those 7 the "no" votes prevailed. In 563 villages the "yes" votes were in the majority, and in 203 villages the "no" votes were in the majority, and in 3 villages there was a tie vote.

In compiling the total vote, however, which was in favor of making legal the manufacture and sale of colored oleomargarine in Ohio, the vote for it was 1,282,606 and the vote against was 799,473, a majority of practically half a million votes.

Therefore, in Ohio, which for many years, practically half a century, prohibited the manufacture of colored oleomargarine, by a vote of the people, with almost half a million majority, the manufacture and sale of the product has been made legal.

As a result of that vote I think it would likewise be the expression of the people of Ohio that the tax should be removed from oleomargarine. The product is perfectly legal. It is a wholesome food, and there is no reason for the tax being maintained any longer, according to the judgment of the people of my State, and my own judgment also. Therefore I shall vote against the amendment and shall vote for the repeal of the tax.

Further than that, as Governor of Ohio, in cooperation with many Senators who have served in like position, we have been attempting to break down trade barriers among the States of the Union. The subject has been on the agendas of the governers' conferences, and our action has been in the interest of the preservation of the whole system of government by breaking down the tariff barriers between the States and breaking down all trade restrictions. Such action has had a constructive public-interest purpose.

Therefore, Mr. President, I think it would be contrary to the intended purpose and all the activities of that organization of governors, which has been so constructive in its purposes and unanimous in its agreements on all resolutions it has considered, if we should fail to remove the tax and all possible barriers on the transportation in interstate commerce of any product which otherwise is legitimate.

Mr. WILEY. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, although I am one of the Senators whose names appear on the amendment heretofore offered by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] to H. R. 2023, I have, before arriving at a conclusion as to whether to cast my vote for or against the amendment, nevertheless, reexamined the subject matter of H. R. 2023 and of the amendment.

I have concluded to vote for the amendment so offered by the senior Senator from Wisconsin. The amendment, as does the bill itself, strikes out the taxation provisions, applicable to oleomargarine, of existing Federal law. Those provisions constitute a tax levied on or with respect to one single food product. I think the elimination of them is sound.

House bill 2023 would, in my judgment, injure the dairying industry. The extent to which that industry would be injured by the bill is a subject on which opinions may differ. Eminent Members of the Senate who are in position to be informed on the subject matter have, however, in the argument which has ensued, clearly indicated their view that extremely serious injury to that industry would result from the passage of the bill.

The importance of preserving the prosperity of the dairying industry cannot be seriously questioned. Not only is that industry of substantial importance to dairy farmers from the standpoint of their own income, to the public as consumers, and to the Nation as a whole, but, in addition, that industry is specifically of great importance to the conservation of the soil.

The provision of the amendment declaring unlawful the manufacture, transportation, handling, possession, sale, use, or serving of yellow oleomargarine in commerce, or after shipment in commerce as yellow oleomargarine, or in connection with the production of yellow oleomargarine for shipment in commerce, prevents the competition, in interstate commerce, of yellow oleomargarine with butter.

I am of the opinion that the provisions contained in the amendment are advisable. I shall therefore, vote for it.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I have already discussed the bill at length, and I do not propose to go back over the substance of the argument. However, much has been said about the public interest in this matter, and it seems to me some of the recent editorials, from some of the leading neswpapers, are pertinent at this moment.

I speak particularly of a newspaper such as the New York Times, which is not merely a local newspaper in New York City or New York State, but is commonly known as the editors' paper, and practically everyone in this country has respect for the judgment of the New York Times. There has been comment in this newspaper on this matter heretofore, but I think at least a part of this morning's editorial is worth quoting, with particular reference to the Wiley amendment.

Mr. President, this amendment was very cleverly drawn. It purports to repeal the taxes, and in a sense leaves the impression that it is in accord with the objective of those supporting the bill itself and that there is only a slight difference between the two proposals.

One of our colleagues the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] last week said that the Wiley amendment was in accord with the platform of the Democratic Party. I merely wish to say that I disagree with that view. I think it is less than frank. I think it is a disingenuous argument. I note that practically every newspaper which has commented on it agrees with this view.

The New York Times of today, January 17, says:

AT LAST, A MARGARINE VOTE

Senate opposition to margarine has at times skated to the brink of filibuster. Nongermane subjects such as luxury taxes and civil-rights amendments have been intruded, to befog the issue. But, when all is summed up on the eve of the first votes, Senator JOHNSTON of South Carolina has accurately simplified the situation in saying: "Today it is a case of the butter boys against justice."

Today we shall see whether the majority of our Senators represent 150,000,000 consumers or whether the butter lobby, representing a fraction of our population, still has the Senate in its pocket. If the Senate wishe to reflect the people's wishes, we remind that body of the vote April 1, 1949, in the House, which we believe spoke the consumer's mind. It was 287 to 89 for the bill that would repeal all restrictive taxes and permit interstate shipment of colored margarine. A preliminary vote, to strike out a proposed ban on interstate shipment, favored free trade by 242 to 137. Our Senators will be on trial today, with the American people watching to see whether they are legislating for the few or for the many.

Strangely enough, in this instance the other leading newspaper of the city of New York, which is also a national paper, and is generally considered a Republican paper, the New York Herald Tribune, contained a very excellent editorial today, January 17, with regard to the Wiley amendment. I wish to cite merely one or two paragraphs. The point is that the tax which has existed on oleomargarine has never been a tax in the sense of a revenue tax, such as an income tax or a true excise tax. The sponsors of the legislation made it clear that they did not expect it to produce revenue, but that it was for the purpose of regulation.

The Wiley amendment itself merely changes the character of the regulation. The fact that it is a tax is merely incidental. It abolishes one regulatory method and then applies one that is even more serious, and I should prefer that the legislation on this whole subject remain as it is, rather than accept the Wiley amendment.

I quote now from the New York Herald Tribune of this morning with reference to the Wiley-Gillette amendment:

Shabby as this dodge is, it appears to have the support of some statesmen from whom we have had reason in the past to expect better things. When the vote is taken we shall be able to identify those Senators, and we hope there are few, who preach free competition as the pride and sheet anchor of the United States and urge an integrated, open market as the salvation of Europe, but who are prepared in practice to fragmentize the United States economically. Passage of the transparently unfair amendment would set up interstate barriers against the sale of a commodity that consumers should be free to buy or not to buy as they choose.

* * * * *

The debate over the antimargarine laws has been much too effective in fulfilling the real function of debate—to clarify issues. It has exposed the unattractive truth of discrimination underlying the double-talk and specious reasoning employed by the defenders of barriers to commerce and consumption.

Senators who vote to repeal margarine taxes are acknowledging that the production and sale of colored and uncolored margarine are in the public interest. Senators who vote to ban margarine from interstate commerce are simply labeling themselves as servants of a pressure group, not public servants.

Mr. President, the editorials which I have cited are typical of many others. I do not expect to read the others. I merely refer the Senate to the editorial in this morning's Washington Post, and I ask that it be inserted at this point in my remarks. It is entitled, "Margarine Vote."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARGARINE VOTE

The Wiley-Gillette amendment offered as a substitute for the House bill repealing Federal excise taxes on margarine, on which the Senate votes today, is also a repeal measure; but, unlike the House bill, it proposes to ban interstate commerce in yellow margarine. If the Senate approves this bill, it will be a triumph for the dairy interests that are behind it. We agree with Senator FULBRIGHT, who has led the fight for repeal of the discriminatory excise taxes that it would be preferable to leave the existing legislation in effect rather than outlaw shipments of colored margarine. For the substitute amendment, instead of removing obstacles to free competition between butter and margarine, would impose new competitive handicaps on the margarine industry by further restricting the area within which yellow margarine could be sold.

Spokesmen for the dairy interests actually have the effrontery to argue that this wrecking substitute amendment would protect the rights of the States by allowing them to decide whether or not yellow margarine shall be sold within their borders. As a matter of fact, it would deprive 15 of the 32 States permitting sales of the colored product of access to sources of supply, since they have no margarine plants of their own. Of course, plants might be constructed in these 15 States. However, as Senator FULBRIGHT points out, quite a number of them do not have sufficiently large populations to provide adequate market outlets justifying investments in new plants.

Another phony argument in favor of the proposed interstate ban on shipments of yellow margarine is that it would give added protection against fraudulent substitution of colored margarine for butter (a danger, by the way, greatly exaggerated by the dairy interests). On the contrary, if interstate trade in yellow margarine were prohibited safeguards against deceit and fraud would be less effective, because yellow margarine would no longer be subject to the protective provisions of the Federal Pure Food Act. Under the House bill, on the other hand, which the dairy interests insist would encourage fraudulent practices, yellow margarine would still be subject to the stringent protective provisions of Federal regulatory law. Evidently Senators who claim that the Wiley-Gillette amendment would give added and necessary protection against so-called butter-legging are either ignorant or disingenuous—willing to play on fears and emotions, and base their case on arguments that they themselves do not believe in.

If the substitute amendment should pass, we hope that the House will refuse to accept Senate modifications that would defeat the basic purpose of its own bill: namely, to free the margarine industry from legislative restrictions that protect the dairy industry from the competition of a cheaper and equally nutritious product. It would be a shabby legislative trick to repeal taxes that obstruct fair competition only to replace them with discriminatory prohibitions of an equally or even more oppressive nature.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I also hold in my hand an editorial from last night's Washington Evening Star, of January 16. I wish to quote one sentence from it:

Masquerading under the favorable appearance of a tax-repeal measure, this carefully thought-up amendment nevertheless would hamstring the margarine industry almost as effectively and unfairly as the present punitive taxes on the butter substitute. It would make it a Federal offense to transport yellow margarine in interstate commerce.

* * * * *

Whatever the effect on the butter industry, there is no justification for setting up an interstate commerce ban designed to protect manufacturers of one good food product from fair market competition by producers of an equally good food product. The Wiley-Gillette amendment should be roundly defeated, preliminary to repeal of all Federal taxes restricting the manufacture and sale of margarine, whether transported in interstate commerce or not.

Mr. President, I ask that the entire editorial be included in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IT SHOULD BE DEFEATED

Coming up for a vote in the Senate tomorrow is a proposed substitute for the margarine tax-repeal bill that is so lacking in merit as to deserve complete and unequivocal rejection by the lawmakers. This last-ditch compromise by the bitter-end opponents of a fair deal for oleo is known as the Wiley-Gillette amendment.

Masquerading under the favorable appearance of a tax-repeal measure, this carefully thought-up amendment nevertheless would hamstring the margarine industry almost as effectively and unfairly as the present punitive taxes on the butter substitute. It would make it a Federal offense to transport yellow margarine in interstate commerce. Such a prohibition could be justified, morally at least, only on the ground that yellow margarine is a dangerous product which should be barred from crossing State boundary lines in the interest of public safety. It is on such a thesis that the Federal Government has outlawed the movement in interstate commerce of harmful drugs, diseased livestock, fraudulent mail, and so on.

But even the most extravagant charges against margarine have not included any serious allegation that the nutritious vegetable compound is dangerous to health or is a menace to public safety. On the contrary, a mass of convincing evidence has been produced to show that it is fully as nourishing and tasty as the finest dairy butter. The only interest that would be hurt by the free competition of margarine for public favor is that of the butter industry—and there is reason to doubt that the effect of this free competition would be as adverse to butter as has been represented by the anti-margarine forces.

Whatever the effect on the butter industry, there is no justification for setting up an interstate commerce ban designed to protect manufacturers of one good food product from fair market competition by producers of an equally good food product. The Wiley-Gillette amendment should be roundly defeated, preliminary to repeal of all Federal taxes restricting the manufacture and sale of margarine, whether transported in interstate commerce or not.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, one interesting editorial, which I think is worth noting, appeared in the Des Moines Tribune, which is one of the leading newspapers of the great State of Iowa, which State has had the great good sense to send to us a very fine Senator, the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], who is one of the cosponsors of the pending amendment. I wish to quote a word or two from the Des Moines Tribune. The editorial is quite a long one, and I do not wish to take the time to read it all, but I do ask that the entire editorial be inserted in my remarks at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BUTTER PROTECTION DOESN'T REALLY HELP

The oleomargarine tax issue is the first item of business scheduled for the Senate as the new session opens. The House passed an oleo tax repeal bill last session.

Undoubtedly many midwestern Senators will try to delay passage of the margarine tax-repeal bill again. Being in favor of the dairy farmer and opposed to the coconut cow is as traditional in the North Central States as being for race segregation in the South. A few midwestern Representatives from large cities have swung to the oleo side in recent years, but the average Congressman from this part of the country dares not give oleomargarine equality in the market with butter.

It is an emotional, unreasoning position—this insistence on protection for butter in the competitive race. It no longer fits the economic facts.

In the first place, oleomargarine consumption is growing steadily at the expense of butter. Restrictive legislation in many States and by the Federal Government has not prevented this. So, at best, the 10-cent tax on colored margarine appears to be a futile effort to hold the butter market.

Secondly, consumers are demanding more and more whole milk and whole milk products. This tends to reduce the production of butter. Attempts by the butter manufacturing industry to keep the dairymen tied to a butter market are not in the best interests of the producer. Dairymen stand to gain most by switching to a whole-milk market, improving sanitation (not so essential when cream alone is sold for making butter), and commercializing or specializing to a greater degree. Butterfat production in the Midwest has been a sort of side-line enterprise on many farms and has not been as efficient as it should be.

Third, midwestern farmers have a big stake in expanding the margarine market nowadays, since they are heavy producers of soybeans. Protecting the market for butter at the expense of margarine is not a net gain to midwestern farmers, by any means.

The changed economic situation indicates that dairy-State Congressmen would be more help to their dairy farmer constituents if they supported legislation to stimulate conversion of the dairy industry to a whole-milk system.

Instead, they have consistently pushed two lines of protective legislation which tend to freeze dairy farming into its present pattern. One is the maintenance of State and Federal oleo tax laws and color restrictions. The other is high price support for butter.

Butter is pegged at 90 percent of parity, and the Government has piled up 130,000,000 pounds of it in storage. In the last Congress, dairy-State Representatives got dairy products added to the mandatory list of price support commodities. Secretary Brannan has announced that butter will be supported at 60 cents a pound next year.

This is too high a price for butter under present conditions. It probably will add to the surplus. It will be helpful to the margarine industry, also.

Yet, in the next few days midwestern Senators will be talking about defending the dairy farmer's competitive position—while actually hindering healthy change in the dairy industry.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I quote from the editorial. Referring to the pending legislation, it says:

It is an emotional, unreasoning position—this insistence on "protection" for butter in the competitive race. It no longer fits the economic facts.

* * * * *

Secondly, consumers are demanding more and more whole milk and whole-milk products. This tends to reduce the production of butter. Attempts by the butter-manufacturing industry to keep the dairymen tied to a butter market are not in the best interests of the producer. Dairymen stand to gain most by switching to a whole-milk market, improving sanitation (not so essential when cream alone is sold for making butter), and commercializing or specializing to a greater degree. Butterfat production in the Midwest has been a sort of side-line enterprise on many farms and has not been as efficient as it should be.

Third, midwestern farmers have a big stake in expanding the margarine market nowadays, since they are heavy producers of soybeans. Protecting the market for butter at the expense of margarine is not a net gain to midwestern farmers by any means.

This is exactly the point I made the other day. It is here confirmed by one of the leading newspapers of Iowa, which is the largest butter-producing State in the United States.

The next point upon which I insisted in my initial statement, and which was very vigorously denied by the leading sponsors of the substitute, is one I especially call to the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] and others who are interested, I am sure, in the dairy industry. I continue to read from the editorial in the Des Moines Tribune:

The changed economic situation indicates that dairy-State Congressmen would be more help to their dairy-farmer constituents if they supported legislation to stimulate conversion of the dairy industry to a whole-milk system.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield myself three more minutes.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to have printed in the RECORD at this point a very interesting editorial which I do not have time to read. It was published in the Kingman, Kans., Journal.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

YELLOW SENATORS FIGHT YELLOW OLEO

One of the first acts to be considered in the second session of the Eighty-first Congress is the bill to repeal the tax on oleomargarine. This bill passed the House of Representatives in the first session although it had to be forced out of the Agricultural Committee. It is now before the Senate for final action.

This discriminatory tax has been in effect 63 years, in spite of the protests of the housewives who have been forced to perform the useless and unpleasant chore of mixing the yellow coloring matter into the oleo with a paddle, food mixer, or some other manual way, which could have been done by the manufacturers practically without cost. Incidentally, this harmless vegetable coloring matter is exactly the same as that used by every manufacturer in the country to make the butter yellow. Yellow is no more the natural color of butter than it is of oleo, except when cows are on wheat or grass pasture, and even then the coloring is added.

Oleo manufacturers must pay a tax of $600 a year and wholesalers $480 a year if they distribute colored oleo and $200 a year if they sell only the uncolored product. Retailers must pay a license of $48 for the colored and $6 for the uncolored oleo. In addition to this, there are 16 States, of which Kansas is one, which levy a State tax on oleo. All of which is, of course, added on to the price the consumer has to pay.

No longer can the dairy interests put up the specious argument about the lack of nutritious values and wholesomeness of oleo, and that the customer should be protected. There may have been a little merit—but not much—to this argument when oleo was an animal-fat product, but that has long since disappeared by the use of vegetable oils, such as cottonseed oil, and other elements which scientists claim make it the equal of butter in food value. This stand by the dairy interests has been abandoned and their only hope now is to fight a rear-guard action and try to ban shipment of yellow oleo in interstate commerce.

Before the war the consumption of butter was about 17 pounds per capita annually; now it is 10 pounds. The heavy tax on oleo has not prevented its increased sale. Americans are using about 6 pounds of oleo a year per capita as compared with 2½ pounds before the war. This latter increase has been due largely to the high price of butter. Millions of dairymen sell their cream and then buy oleo for their own use.

It would make little difference to the dairy interests if they never sold a pound of butter on the market. The Government is buying the surplus in order to keep up the price and the first of last month had $60,000,000 invested in butter and still buying more. The Government also has a price support for cotton and at the same time levies a tax on oleo which cuts down the sale of cottonseed oil. It is not fair to the consumers to have to pay their share of the taxes for these price supports and then have to pay another tax on oleo because the price of butter is high. If the tax is not repealed now it will be because parliamentary trickery and political skullduggery is used to keep it from coming to vote. It will be worth watching to see how the two Kansas Senators act in the matter.

F. J. C.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I merely use those editorials as examples of recent expressions of newspapers published in dairying States which have furnished some of the leading advocates of the Wiley amendment.

Mr. President, the vote on the so-called Wiley amendment is obviously the test vote on the legislation. If that amendment should be adopted it would mean, for practical purposes, that the Senate has defeated the effort to repeal the restrictive legislation on margarine which has existed for some 64 years. If the Senators have any regard for the demands and wishes of the vast majority of the people of the country I cannot believe that they will insist upon the retention of this legislation on the statute books. Such genuine polls as the recent election in Ohio have shown that at least a great majority—I would estimate it to be in the neighborhood of 2 to 1—are in favor of the pending legislation, that is the legislation repealing the restrictions.

On two occasions the House of Representatives, the Members of which are as close to the people of the country as any group could be, since they are elected every 2 years, has voted by a majority of approximately 3 to 1 to repeal the existing law. The House of Representatives turned down, by the same majority, the precise legislation as represented by the Wiley-Gillette amendment.

I may say that I do not think the House of Representatives would accept the Wiley-Gillette amendment at all, and, of course, if the Senate should insist upon approving the Wiley-Gillette amendment it would result in our being in a position of stalemate with the House. I cannot believe the House will accept such an amendment, and I sincerely hope Senators will search their consciences before casting their votes on the question, and will reject the Wiley-Gillette amendment.

Mr. FULBRIGHT subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert as part of my remarks previously made, a telegram received yesterday from an eminent doctor in my State, Dr. D. E. White, relating to the question of the quality and healthfulness of oleomargarine as compared to butter.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EL DORADO, ARK., January 15, 1950.

Hon. J. W. FULBRIGHT,
United States Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

As an aid to you in your fight to eliminate the unfair taxes on oleomargarine actual statistical data as confirmed by medical science reveals oleomargarine to have a greater food value to the human body than does butter. Oleomargarine has been highly fortified with vitamins and other important health giving substances and is not only as good, but is better for human consumption than is butter. Furthermore it is much more clean and sanitary than butter from the time it is prepared until it ultimately reaches the consumer. Am sure you can readily obtain actual statistics for the sake of comparison but if not, I will be glad to assist you and refer you to proper source for factual data.

Your friend,

D. E. WHITE, M. D.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I yield to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN] 5 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from New York is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, during the past 10 days I have spent much time in studying the pending legislation to repeal the excise and licensing taxes on the production and marketing of oleomargarine. I have also studied, with deep interest, the substitute measure sponsored by 26 Members of the Senate proposing to prohibit the shipment in interstate commerce of oleomargarine colored a particular shade of yellow.

This legislation is of special and particular interest to me because it involves one of the large sectors of the economy of New York State—the dairy industry. It is also of interest to me because it involves the consumers of New York, although to a lesser extent than those of other States. Finally, this legislation involves legal and economic questions of wide and ramifying importance to the entire Nation.

In the campaign preceding the special election in New York State last November, I told the voters of New York that I would vote against the excise tax on oleo. I believed then—and I still believe—that a discriminatory influence exercised in favor of one domestic industry and against another by the use of the Federal taxing power is wrong in itself. I believed—and I still believe—that an excise tax on a product such as oleomargarine is a tax on the consumer and not on the industry. When that tax is borne by the group in the population least able to support it, it is immoral.

But today the question is not one affecting the tax. We are all agreed that this special tax—the excise tax on oleomargarine—must and will go. Today the question is whether the Federal Government shall substitute for that tax a prohibition on the shipment in interstate commerce of all oleomargarine or margarine which is colored yellow in imitation of butter. After much deliberation, I have decided to vote in favor of that prohibition. I shall state, as briefly as I can, why I have so decided.

My reasons are simple and direct. I believe that oleomargarine or margarine colored yellow is, without doubt, an imitation of butter, so designed and so colored as to invite the housewife and the restaurant keeper to use it as butter. Although it may be labeled in letters four inches high on the carton, it is not so labeled when it reaches the dinner table, either in the home or in the restaurant. No one says, "Please pass the oleo."

First. I believe that the dairy industry should be protected against the obvious imitation of its product, just as soap manufacturers and others are.

Second. I believe that the consumers—the men, women and children at the dinner or restaurant table—should be protected against this imitation, as far as the Federal power can logically go without invading the prerogatives of the States.

Third. I believe that the manufacture of oleo is controlled in a monopolistic manner, and that the price of the oleo manufacturers' product is based as much on what the traffic will bear as on the cost of production.

Fourth. I believe that the entire dairy industry—including that of New York—which is one of the leading dairy States of the Nation—would suffer great damage, with consequent ramifications throughout the structure of American agriculture, unless the proposed substitute amendment is adopted.

Fifth. I believe that there is a point at which a decrease in the returns of dairy farmers will be harmful to the entire national economy, including industrial workers. Such a point might be reached without the protection of the Wiley-Gillette substitute.

Sixth. I believe that the profits of the oleo industry, and the fact that the cost of production of oleo is lower than that of butter, are based in some measure on the lower costs of farm and factory labor in the southern States where oleo is produced and manufactured.

Seventh. I believe that foreign producers of vegetable oils will benefit as much, if not more, than domestic oils producers from a vast expansion of oleo production in this country, and that this foreign production is based on the most exploited and underpaid labor in the world.

Eighth. I believe that the consumers who need and should get a butter substitute at a price cheaper than butter should be able to get a substitute, not an imitation, at its minimum price, and not be required to pay premium prices for a coloring in order to deceive themselves and their families into thinking that they are getting butter. Oleo can and should develop its own market.

Mr. President, it may very well be that in the long run it would be desirable that fortified and enriched oleomargarine should replace butter in everyday use, and that eventually butter should be a luxury item. This eventuality presupposes, of course, that the cost of production of such oleomargarine shall continue to be considerably lower than that of butter.

To permit such an eventuality, however, it is essential that we proceed along two definite and difficult lines. The first is to launch an integrated and far-reaching program to help the dairy industry adjust the transfer of production from butter to other dairy products. Few people realize, and yet it is a hard fact, that the dairy industry has delicate interrelations reaching into the whole field of animal agriculture, the live-stock industry and soil conservation. It is one of the most complex industries in the American economy. To tamper with one aspect of it without considering the impact upon the others is to play games with an economic atom bomb.

Mr. President, I have no ready solution. Yet, one must be worked out. It will take deep consideration and study, but until such a solution is found, I do not think that we dare strike a body blow at the butter industry which has already suffered a critical shrinkage of its market because of oleo.

On the second front, we must strike and strike hard at the monopolistic nature of the oleomargarine industry. If we are to depend upon that industry for a substantial and major part of a food which is so essential to our daily life, we must insure that the freest and fairest competition exists in that field. There are 3,500 creameries in the United States and only 28 oleomargarine plants. I cannot in good conscience favor an industry in which one or two major combines control the entire output at the expense of an industry so widespread, involving so many of our farm producers.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I shall vote in favor of the Gillette-Wiley substitute. If it is defeated, I shall, in any event, vote for the repeal of the oleo excise taxes which represent, to my mind, an unfair and improper use of the Federal taxing power, oppressing the consumer without bringing a commensurate benefit.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield to the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] what time he desires.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, a motion has been made to strike from the amendment in the nature of a substitute all those parts and parcels repealing or reducing excise taxes, except, of course, the tax on oleomargarine. Since there will be no discussion, obviously, of this particular point, I wanted to make some remarks concerning it.

Mr. President, my position on the wartime excise taxes is very well known. For many months I have said that those taxes should be either reduced substantially or should be repealed. But I strongly oppose the attempt to repeal or to reduce any of the wartime excise taxes in this bill.

In the first place, Mr. President, the bill now before the Senate originated in the House Committee on Agriculture. For nearly half a century the Committee on Agriculture has had jurisdiction of oleomargarine and of legislation dealing with it. Therefore, if this bill should pass with the excise taxes reduced or repealed thereby, the conference between the Senate and the House would be composed of members representing the Senate Finance Committee and representatives of the Agriculture Committee of the House of Representatives. That would obviously be most unfortunate, and would create a conflict between committees in the House and in the Senate on a jurisdictional question.

It would be most unfortunate for another reason which I think should appeal to all Members of the Senate: If we are to repeal the excise taxes or to reduce them, then certainly the taxing committee in the Senate should have the advantage of the judgment and experience of the members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives who have given long years of study to our tax program. If it were a mere matter of removing the excise taxes, it might be said with some show of reason that the House Agriculture Committee could as well do that as anyone else could. But if we remove the excise taxes, we must eventually and inevitably be called upon, whatever we may decide about them, to consider at least a recommendation for some compensatory increases in tax rates so as to make up for the loss of revenue incident to the drastic reduction or repeal of the excise taxes. In the consideration of that important matter, is not the Senate Finance Committee entitled to have the advice and cooperation of those Members of the
